we have to-day, and of many yet to be invented. Surely these most ancient machines also proclaim mind work. As the earliest science was developed in the cells of the alchemists and astrologers, these most ancient tools were developed in and about certain ancient cells—those that lie at the foundation of animal and vegetable life. If the few rude tools found in ancient ruins prove minds worked there, much more do the machines of nature proclaim its creator a mind. Certain vegetable forms, and many crystals, and the snow-flakes remind us that "God geometrizes." The eggs of a system, and the ear a real telephone. The sting of the wasp is a saw, while the mosquito carries a whole quiver of weapons—two swords, two spears, two saws, and a suction pump. Does pain in nature perplex you? Read how Romanes learned that God seeks for us not pleasure but perfection, toward which even pain is working. The black fly of the Adirondacks gave medical science its scissors lance that opens internally, reminding us that consciously, as well as unconsciously, man has copied the tools of God, oftenest unconsciously, "thinking God's thoughts after him," as a son is like his father.

But our devices, after six thousand years, are still less perfect than God's at the beginning, as is suggested by the bee sting, which a scientist contrasted on a stereopticon screen with the so-called point of a cambric needle. The latter, greatly magnified, showed like a stub pen with four inches across the point, while the bee sting, equally magnified, retained its point, on which the lecturer said, "Man can not make a point, but God can." Though God's machines surpass ours in perfection, the fact that we have, by our own thought, devised so many of the same tools and machines, makes us realize that God is a mind like ourselves, but greater. And if he is such a mind our own instincts as fathers assure us he must love and be loved, must speak to his children and hear their cry.

Though he is so great and we so dim,
We are made in his image to witness him.

Could I in my infinite longing do all for this man,
And think God alone shall not help him who yet alone can?

—BROWNING.

The Two Crowns of Fostedina of Friesland

BY ELIZABETH M. CLARK

CAUSE and effect are often inextricably mixed, and are often inter-active. Students of anthropology may know better than do most of us whether the original settlers chose Holland because it was so near the water, or whether this proximity had the effect of moulding the national character. However that may be, the love for cleanliness evident throughout Holland remains a good example of the eternal fitness of things. Logicians may question whether it is possible to see that which is evident only through the fact of the absence of its opposite quality, but the traveler through the land of dykes leaves the country feeling sure that he has seen actual, positive, self-existent cleanliness.

There are other features of the national life that are also nearly self-explanatory; some have long puzzled the student of history. For instance, the head-dress worn for centuries back by the ladies of Holland; whence came it and what is its meaning? For many years the only possible answer was an echo,—“Whence a what?”

Recently, however, the discovery of an old manuscript told a story which is as interesting in itself as it is in bearing upon the problem, hitherto unsolved. This story, based upon the old Frisian manuscript and repeated in Holland to-day, runs about as follows; some of the names are fictitious, but the story itself is beyond question.

It was at dusk one evening, twelve centuries and more ago, Fostedina of Friesland was sitting in the tower room of her father's castle, putting very fine stitches into some intricate embroidery, but her heart was not in the task, and she was glad when the shades of evening served as excuse for laying aside the work. Carelessly crossing her hands on her lap she looked out dreamily into the peaceful stillness of the oncoming night.

The first no sound broke the dead silence; then suddenly Fostedina became aware of horses approaching, and she counted more than twenty as they and their riders came into sight. A guard in front, a guard behind, and between them twelve or thirteen weary-looking people, men and women, who were led to the castle dungeon. Fostedina's eyes, as they gazed into the deepening gloom, grew wide with astonishment. Those gentle, young women; what had they done to deserve the horrors of that dungeon at which she herself, prime minister's daughter though she was, could not bear to look?

Slowly the train passed in the darkness; but for the reverberations of the horses' hoofs, Fostedina could have thought it all a dream impression. As it was, she wondered again who the people were, what crimes they had committed.

The presence in the room startled her. “Thy father dines to-night with the king,” said the voice of her old nurse, Mina. “He bade me tell thee he has affairs of state to settle concerning the new sect, the Christians.”

There was a strange quality in old Mina's voice—a controlled mechanical quality as of one delivering a message with which she had no sympathy. Fostedina noted the strangeness, but did not attempt to analyze it.

When I shall dine in my own room alone, and afterward thou shalt come and tell me about those Christians and their crimes,” she said. (Fostedina, according to the Frisian manuscript, was about seventeen years of age, but no mention is anywhere made of her mother.)

That night Mina chose to serve her young mistress at table, all the time studying her face with keenest scrutiny. Should she, or should she not? Would it be wise to do it? Would it be cowardly not to? The old nurse did not find it easy to decide, but at last the question was settled.

The young and wealthy need the Lord Christ as truly as the old and poor,” she said to herself. “She has asked to be told about Christians; she shall judge for herself. Perhaps, perhaps, this will be the beginning of better things than I can foresee.”

Fostedina, young and fearless (what had she to fear of her father's property, she, the adored of all classes?) thought it fine fun to put on a long, gray cloak, similar to Mina's, and to go with her out of the castle gates to a cave on the hill. The cave she knew well; was it not there that she and the king's son, Agillus, had often played as little children? This seemed to be a more serious game, but it interested her, and she did not shrink.

At the gate they were joined by Johann—grave, gray, old Johann, who looked strangely from Mina to Fostedina, and back again. Johann had been a trusty servitor of the prime minister during more years than Fostedina had lived, and he, too, loved the young girl. But he certainly did not understand her presence there that night. Mina answered his unspoken question. “It is the will of the Lord,” she said.

Johann's face cleared, and took on a rarely beautiful smile. “It is well,” he said simply.

Inside the cave, Fostedina saw a group of about thirty people; she knew that most of them must belong to her father's retinue, but she recognized very few, and old Mina felt glad that no one suspected the presence of the prime minister's daughter.

As soon as Johann entered the cave, a man rose at the other end, and gave out a hymn; then Fostedina heard the first heartfelt singing and the first real prayer of her life. Many were the petitions offered for those who had that night been imprisoned in the castle dungeon, but Fostedina noticed that these prayers were rather for strength in trial than for deliverance from it.

It was all very strange, especially strange when some one prayed for the king and the prime minister, that they “might be led out of darkness into light.” Fostedina had not decided what to make of this extraordinary petition when the leader of the meeting rose again. The few spluttering candles gave a weird, flickering light, but Fostedina could see that the speaker was a gaunt a Christian, but she hesitated to acknowledge the fact, partly through fear of her father and partly through fear of the court priest, who was a cold, stern, hard man.

At last the night came before the day when the Christians in the castle dungeon were to be put to a cruel death. Two of the women of the original number had died in their prison, but others had been added to the little group, and the priest was in a hurry lest some of these also should find the easy release of death and thus escape his vengeful power.

In the morning, however, when the jailer came to lead out the prisoners to their doom, the dungeon was empty. Fostedina was sitting near her father when this was reported to him, and she was overheard to say: “They are safe then? Oh, God, I thank thee.”

At once she was taken before the king, who asked her whether she had helped the prisoners to escape. Fearlessly she lifted her eyes to his and said: “I, and I alone, have done this thing. I pitied the people, and—and—oh, king, I, too, believe in the Christian's God.” It seemed to Fostedina as if some near and real Presence spoke through her this declaration of faith.

Agillus, the king's son, plead with his father; Nero-nicus, the prime minister, plead with his sovereign, each for the safety of the girl he loved better than his own life or position, but the cries of the people and the threatenings of the priest prevailed against them both. So the king himself led Fostedina out into the presence of the maddened mob, deprived of the prey promised for their festival, and said, “What shall be done with this girl who has set free the Christians?”

Eager hands stretched out to drag her down into the midst of those human wolves, but Agillus put his arm protectingly around her and said, “If Fostedina goes to the arena I go with her, and we die there together.”

There was a look in his eyes, a tone in his voice, which said he meant the words. The people did not wish to lose the royal prince, and suddenly they remembered their old love for Fostedina. Moved again by one impulse, they cried as with one voice:

The priest stepped forward with a hard smile curling his cold lips. “Let her not die,” he said, “rather let her live to wear a crown such as her Master, the carpenter's son, also wore. For her, as for him, the fittest crown is one of thorns.”

The next day, from sunrise to sunset, Fostedina stood in the market-place wearing a heavy crown of thorns, which cut and bruised the delicate forehead. The next day, she was gone,—she and Mina and Johann, together with the leader of the Christians and others of his followers. They had gone, none knew whither, and before a week had passed, Agillus also had disappeared.

Seven years went by, and with their passing the old king grew older still. Finally he died, and a messenger was quickly sent to the army of the Franks, calling Agillus to return as king to Friesland. He, quickly enough, sent a message in another direction, and Fostedina was brought back to her own country as the chosen bride of the new ruler. Years had truly passed since the day when she had been forced out of the city, yet when she entered again, the marks of the crown of thorns were clearly visible. At this the people were sorely troubled, and at first knew not what to do.

However, in the early morning of the day appointed for the wedding, six young girls, chosen from the noblest families of the city of Leeuwarden, approached the bride-elect and presented her with a golden crown, shaped in such a way as to hide all the marks made by the crown of thorns.

Fostedina put it on. Then she took it off. It was heavy, it was not beautiful, and personally Fostedina would have preferred the scars, which were to her not a disgrace, but a glory. But she understood the feeling of the people, and she took the gift as a peace-offering, saying, as she placed it again on her head, “The old crown of thorns was more beautiful than this, but God has a still higher crown than that in reserve for me, and I will wear this until he gives me his best.”

More than twelve centuries ago, Fostedina of Friesland wore her two crowns. To-day, the women of Holland still wear what is called the Friesland cap, though very few know the reason why.

man, old before his time, weary, and yet full of fire—essentially a new type of man to this petted daughter of a wealthy home.

“I bring you two messages to-night,” began the preacher, “one from our God, who says: ‘Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God.’ The other message is from our comrades now in the dungeon. This piece of parchment was passed into Brother Martin's hand as they went by this evening.”

The parchment was carefully unrolled, and from it were read the words: “But God forbid that we should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Fostedina, who had listened eagerly for words of treason or crime, was dumbfounded. Once again she knew not what to think.

The speaker spoke on the two texts, not at great length, but simply, earnestly and with power. Fostedina felt sure that the Christian's God was the only true God, but—

“Time presses,” said old Johann. “In ten minutes more the castle gates will be closed for the night.” Softly again, but this time swiftly, the forms faded into the night. It seemed to Fostedina like the second dream procession of that strange day.

Several times during the weeks that followed did the young girl listen to the earnest words of the preacher, and to the no less earnest prayers of those who followed him as he followed the Lord Christ. Fostedina became

Breathing Places for New York's Pent-Up Millions

IF you are visiting New York and want to know it thoroughly—feel its pulse-beat, as it were, and meet face to face its people of all sorts and conditions of life—you must not omit a tour of its parks, playgrounds and recreation piers. To include all boroughs in your rounds would involve interminable journeys, for the greater city is spread over a goodly area. Even if you limit investigations to big, seething, unique Manhattan, a not insignificant quota of time is required. The magnificent demesne of Central Park, which, by reason of distance is practically out of reach of the most congested section where the poorest people live, can give you more than a long day's entertainment. At Morningside and Riverside Parks, and on the Speedway along the Harlem, you may see millionaires and their families taking their pleasure in coaches, landaus, drags, carts, and on horseback, if you time your visit before the hot season, when fortune's favorites fly away to Newport, Lenox, Hempstead, the Catskills, or across the Atlantic to Europe. Should the beautiful Bronx—"Lover's Paradise"—tempt you beyond Manhattan, you will find there, as a rule, few people who cannot afford street car fare, and a goodly bit of time for their outings. Both here and at Central Park are groups of children taking holiday under the care of missionaries, who have brought them up from the slums.

Saturday afternoons and Sundays the Bronx is crowded with a motley throng, numbering many families, in which parents have half-starved themselves all week to save a few dimes to bring the children where they may get a breath of fresh air and a chance to play on the grass. "All the people in New York are here," you say, "there must be no one anywhere else." Yet as far as cars, ferry-boats and excursion steamers will take you in every direction, Saturday afternoon and Sunday, you will find occasion to say the same thing. Take a downtown car, and there is repetition of this impression. In every tenement district, streets are thronged. Roofs, curbs stoops, fire-escapes are alive with men, women, children, and infants in arms, and every open area that goes by the name of park or playground overflows with its fraction of the city's multitude.

Below Central Park, that unknown Paradise to the down-town poor, who cannot walk to it or pay carfare to reach it, New York has not one large park. The narrow island, with its teeming thousands, is at a disadvantage with cities that can spread themselves laterally. Yet its river fronts, east and west, are being utilized as breathing-places and amusement-centres in an original way. The recreation pier was a brilliant idea, and has been a success from the opening of the first of the series (at present numbering seven), at the foot of East Third street, in 1897, when attendance for the season ranged from 500 to 2,000 in the afternoons, 3,000 to 4,000 in the evenings, running as high as 7,000 on hot nights. The city has sixteen to twenty-five attendants on each pier, cheap lunches are sold, and in the afternoon and evening there is music by a band. They are much frequented by mothers, who bring their babies here for the river breeze, and by "little fathers" and "little mothers," who look after small brother and sisters while their mothers are at work. Such distinctive guardians are in evidence everywhere, and their ways and the ways of their charges are as full of interest as of pathos. Observe, if you please, the haughty air of the lad in our picture who takes his small brother abroad in a wheel-chair, and note the proud smile of the tot who in such style goes airing in Paradise Park around Five Points! Central Park is quite outclassed by such grandeur and delight! The tidy little woman treating her brother at the soda fountain is as much the envy of the curious observers as the hostess of a "pink tea" can be to ladies who cannot give pink teas.

The frequenters of a park in the predominating nationalities of its neighborhood. Thus, in Tompkins Square one finds many respectable-looking Germans in Washington Square, dark-eyed men and children suggest Italy and Syria; in Seward Park, Yiddish is spoken, and the Russian Jew elbows other European and Orientals out of place. At the Battery, Ireland is in the ascendant, and you hear brogues that you "can cut with a feather." Union Square may be considered cosmopolitan, because loafers like it so well.

All of these open spaces serve in great measure as outdoor resting-places and reading-rooms to tired men—some seeking work and finding it not, some doing work, others recuperating after hours of toil, some sodden with drink. I am all children at play, but not up to the grass. To find grass that children may play on freely one must go to the parks, and there one does not find many children, except on Saturday afternoons and Sundays. In many of the small places called "parks," downtown, there is neither grass nor trees to speak of, and vacation schools in these regions have their playgrounds inside the school buildings, covered head on the roofs. As poor substitutes as these for flowery meadows and greening fields, statistics show them to be very popular. There are about seven playgrounds under direction of the Board of Education in 1897, as the writer understands, there were none

III. ANCIENT INSCRIPTIONS OF PALESTINE

BY
REV. T. F. WRIGHT, PH.D.

IN the work of exploring Palestine with a view to recovering the monuments of the Bible times, nothing is so valuable as inscriptions. When Lachish was excavated, and the tablet was found, which was shown and translated in the article on "The Testimony of the Mounds," all other objects discovered were of relatively little value, and more study has been given to it than to all the rest. The reason of the supreme value of the inscriptions is that they tell more about the past. The very letters which they use bear upon the origin of the alphabet. The names of persons and places throw light upon those which are found mentioned in the Bible. Especially do the facts related confirm the Bible record.

AN INSCRIBED LAMP

A sign of it that the Arabs, who at first saw no value in it, became at last so covetous for a great price, with perhaps some superstitious feeling that it might have hidden virtues in it, that they broke it into portable fragments and carried it away. At last, however, in the international competition for it, the French were victorious, the fragments were nearly all recovered, and the stone found a refuge in the Louvre.

This was before the establishment of the museum at Constantinople. Now such a stone would immediately go there, but casts would be made for other museums.

Reading this inscription great skill has been used. The letters are, as in Hebrew, pictures of objects simplified to conventional forms, representing the ox, horse, camel, door, window, and so on. The difficulty due to breaking has been almost wholly surmounted. To give a part of the inscription:

I am Mesha, son of Chemosh; Gad, king of Moab, the Dibonite. My father reigned over Moab thirty years, and I reigned after my father. And I built this sanctuary for Chemosh in Karchah, a sanctuary of salvation, for he saved me from all aggressors and made mock on all mine enemies with contempt. Omri was King of Israel, and oppressed Moab many days, and Chemosh was angry with his aggressions. His son succeeded him, and he also said, 'I will oppress Moab.' In my days he said, 'Let us go, and I will see my desire upon him and his house,' and Israel said, 'I will destroy you.' . . . And the men of Gad dwelled in the country of Ataroth from ancient times, and the king of Israel fortified Ataroth. I assaulted the wall and captured it, and killed all the warriors of the city. . . . I did not kill the women and maidens, for I devoted them to Ashtaro-Chemosh, and I took the vessels of Jehovah and offered them before Chemosh."

Noting the rest for lack of space, we see Omri and Ahab, kings of Israel, described in I. Kings, 16 to 22. We see the Moabite god Chemosh and the female deity Ashtar or Astarte, who was worshipped with unbreakable rites; and we see the Mesha, whose desperate effort to escape the vengeance of Israel is described in II. Kings 3.

This is the Moabite stone, and it confirms the Bible history.

Turning to a peaceful inscription we find one in the passage cut through the rock from the Virgin's Fountain to the Pool of Silam at Jerusalem, in order that the people might drink in time of siege. The conduit is about one thousand feet long and is not straight, but it reached its goal. When the explorers crept through at peril of their lives, they came upon this inscription, marking the resting-place of the workmen. It runs as follows:

"Behold the excavation! Now this is the history of the tunnel. While the workmen were lifting up the pick, each towards the other; and while there were yet three cubits to be broken through, the voice of the one called to his neighbor, for there was an excess in the rock on the right. They rose up, they struck on the west of the excavation, each to meet the other, pick to pick. And the waters flowed from their outlet to the pool."

This is very truth-telling, that they failed to meet exactly, and so by voice guided each other to the same placed stones at the entrances to the temple court, prohibiting the passing of anyone but a purified Jew. One of these stones has been found, and its Greek has been read:

"No stranger is to enter within the balustrade round the temple and enclosure. Whoever is caught will be responsible to himself for his death, which will ensue."

This is to be kept in mind when reading in Acts 21 about Paul bringing Greeks into the temple, which came near to causing his death.

There are a great many smaller inscriptions which are largely reproduced in Ganneau's Archaeological Researches. Many of these are on gravestones, such as the following, which reads, in very contracted form:

"O Lord Jesus Christ, help thy servant."

Another is double, and was placed on either side of the door of a tomb. It is a pair of quotations from the Septuagint or Greek Bible, the first verse of Psalm 71, "Upon thee, O Lord, have I put my trust, let me never be confounded;" and the first verse of the ninety-first Psalm, "He that dwelleth in the secret-place (literally, help) of the Most High."

Many inscriptions stamped on vase-handles are coming to light, because the handles were thicker and stronger than the body of the vase. A single one, in the museum of Andover Theological Seminary, reminds us by its symbol of the bullock worship of Israel. Although the last letters are imperfectly stamped, the meaning is plain, "For the sake of the happiest destiny," showing a votive offering, probably of wine.

An inscribed lamp found in such a place that it belongs to the first century, before the Christians were driven from Jerusalem, is deeply interesting. It was placed in a tomb to watch over the dead, and its inscription says:

"The light of Christ shines for all." Thus they said, "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether, therefore, we live or die, we are the Lord's." Romans 14: 8.

A Gospel Tent Campaign

Prof. W. S. Weeden, of New York, and Rev. J. W. Van DeVenter, of Philadelphia, Pa., have purchased a large new tent, with a view to evangelistic work during the summer months. Mr. Van D. Venter has been in Scotland and England for the last two years, on an evangelistic tour. Mr. Weeden is well known throughout this country as one of the leading singing evangelists. They opened the campaign May 21, at Piqua, O. Pastors or Y. M. C. Our Relief Work in China

AT every step of the present relief movement, the Divine hand is felt in guidance and direction, removing all obstacles and clearing the way for the work. So palpable is this influence that we are abundantly warranted in believing that great spiritual results are to be attained, and that the opening up of that vast empire to Gospel influences may be looked for, not in any small degree, but upon a scale far exceeding all former experiences. Not only are the people of the famine provinces eager to welcome back the missionaries, but the provincial Governors and local authorities, Prince Ching, the Military Governor of Peking, the famous Chang Chih Tung, Governor of Honan province, Governor Chan Chun Hsuen, the new ruler of Shansi, and lastly, the Imperial Government of China itself, in the person of its great statesman and Viceroy, Earl Li Hung Chang, are one and all allies in this campaign on the side of the Gospel.

This is not an overdrawn picture but a glorious reality. It is our privilege, as a nation, to bring to the starving millions of China, that message of bread and blessing which we sent in other times to Armenia, to Russia, to India, and to other distant lands, and which in every instance was productive of the most beneficent results. India has already yielded a great spiritual harvest, and the reapers are still busy. But we must prepare for a still larger harvest in China, where the Divine hand is so obviously pointing the way, commanding us to enter and possess that land for Christ.

The new century can bring no grander opportunity for Christian service than this. It is the duty of every one who loves the work of the Master, and who prays for the world's redemption, to have a personal share in this greatest of modern missionary campaigns. By helping to rescue these starving multitudes, in whose behalf the government and statesmen of China appeal to us, and showing to its people that Christianity is a religion of love and forgiveness, we can win the esteem of the Chinese people and their leaders, and thus open all hearts to the Gospel.

Do your share by sending in your offering. Send liberally and quickly. And do not forget to accompany the gift with an earnest prayer that, through these practical manifestations of sympathy and pity, China's millions may be led into the light of Christianity.

The Housing of the City Poor

A GREAT many of our readers are living in the ample space afforded by detached homes in lovely country villages. What can they know about the scanty accommodations which are at the disposal of the poor in great cities, in New York for example, where, in the tenement districts, twelve, fourteen, and twenty families, averaging five persons each, live in a single house! A three-room flat is oftener found than a five-room apartment, and in many cases two of the rooms are dark, with no chance for proper ventilation. No wonder the children here look pallid, like plants grown in cellars. Few of the children of the very poor have any acquaintance with table etiquette, because their mothers seldom set the table. They have no time, and they have no dishes. The mother dispenses bread and sausage, or bread and cheese, cutting off morsels as she stands beside her bare pine table, and handing them to the waiting children. One reason why the man of the house drinks is shown in the absence of appetizing food in his home. He has married in her youth a girl out of a factory, who did not know the first elements of cooking, of thrift, or of home-making. The frying-pan and the tea-pot are her only implements, and she does not get good results from either.

In our Settlements, wherever they are, and in our working girls' clubs, much is done to ameliorate this condition of things. The girls are taught to cook well, to make soups, bread and cake, to broil and to boil and to roast. Also they learn to sew and to mend. They will be better wives by and by, for the instruction they have had in these happy evenings at the club and the Settlement. The self-denial of those who toil for them is repaid a thousandfold by the manifest good that is done.

And what shall we say of such a blessed outing as is given to the children of the poor, when they go to so lovely a place as Mont-Lawn? Some of the little fellows have never seen more of the sky than the strip of blue which they descry far above them between the narrow walls of the barracks where they pass their lives. They are wild with joy under God's infinite expanse of sunlit azure. The freedom of the fields is theirs; they may pick heaps of wild flowers; they may hear the birds sing in the great trees; they may race like colts in the green pastures. Three times a day they sit down at a board abundantly spread with good things, and are given what is a novelty in their experience, a square meal. Blessings on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fresh-Air work at Mont-Lawn. It bestows largesse of happiness on children who have had it doled out to them hitherto.

Those whose privilege it is to work among the poorest, acknowledge with surprise the tractable nature of the little ones. The main difference between these children, exposed as they have been to the contacts and temptations of the streets, and our own carefully nurtured and sheltered boys and girls, is that the former are more obedient, more docile and more grateful than ours. They are not, as a rule, naughty children, but, on the contrary, having learned patience in a hard school, they are gentle and well-behaved. That they are deficient in vitality is sadly evident. Poor food, sleep in close and stuffy rooms, and inherited delicacy of constitution account for this. Give them a Fresh-Air chance, such as a fortnight at Mont-Lawn means, and they improve with marvelous rapidity.

Summer Religion

IT takes more grace to be an earnest and useful Christian in summer than in any other season. The very destitute, through lack of fuel and thick clothing, may find the winter the trying season; but those comfortably circumstanced find summer the Thermopylæ that tests their Christian courage and endurance.

The spring is suggestive of God and heaven and a resurrection day. That eye must be blind that does not see God's footstep in the new grass, and hear his voice in the call of the swallow at the eaves. In the white blossoms of the orchards we find suggestion of those whose robes have been made white in the blood of the Lamb. A June morning is a door opening into heaven.

So autumn mothers a great many moral and religious suggestions. The season of corn-husking, the gorgeous woods that are becoming the catafalque of the dead year, remind the dullest of his own fading and departure.

But summer fatigues and weakens, and no man keeps his soul in as desirable a frame, unless by positive resolution and especial implorations. Pulpit and pew often get stupid together, and ardent devotion is adjourned until September.

But who can afford to lose two months out of each year, when the years are so short and so few? He who stops religious growth in July and August will require the next six months to get over it. Nay, he never recovers. At the season when the fields are most full of leafage of life, let us not be lethargic and stupid. Oh, that God would make us all earnest workers!

Church Cordiality

AROUND the door of country meeting-houses it has always been the custom for the people to gather before church and after church for social intercourse and the shaking of hands. Perhaps, because we ourselves were born in the country and have never got over it, the custom pleases us. In the cities we arrive the last moment before the service and go away the first moment after. We act as though the church were a rail-car, into which we go when the time for starting arrives, and we get out again as soon as the Depot of the Doxology is reached. We protest against this business way of doing things. Shake hands when the benediction is pronounced with those who sat before and those who sat behind you. Meet the people in the aisle, and give them Christian salutation. Postponement of the dining-hour for fifteen minutes will damage neither you nor the dinner. That is the moment to say a comforting word to the man or woman in trouble.

The sermon was preached to the people in general is your place to apply it in a practical manner, to individual heart.

The church aisle may be made the road to heaven. Many a man who was unaffected by what the minister said has been captured for God by the Christian way of an unpretending layman on the way out. You may call it personal magnetism, or natural cordiality, but there are some Christians who have such an arcway of shaking hands after meeting that it amounts to a benediction. Such greeting is not made with the hand. The left hand is good for a great many things, for instance to hold a fork or twist a curl, but it is never made to shake hands with, unless you have the use of the right. Nor is it done by the tips of the fingers laid loosely in the palm of another. Nor is it done with a glove on. Gloves are good to keep out the cold and make one look well, but have them so easily be removed, as they should be, for they are non-conductors of Christian magnetism. Make the hand. Place it in the palm of your friend. Clasp the fingers across the back part of the hand you grip. Then let all the animation of your heart rush to the shoulder, and from there to the elbow, and then through the fore-arm and through the wrist, till your friend feels the whole charge of Gospel electricity.

A Tribute to Chinese Christians

IN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through the courtesy of a subscriber, Mr. J. H. Theberath, of Newark, N. J., we are privileged to publish the following letter from Miss J. E. Martha-Lebeus, a missionary at Sing-in, China. Here, in a remote district, happily far from the scenes of the Boxer troubles, the character of the Chinese Christians and the general attitude of the people toward Christianity appear in a bright and encouraging light, which should arouse the desire in the hearts of God's people to strive more and more for the conversion of China's millions. The letter is as follows:

SING-IN, CHINA, April 29, 1911.

I see wonderful progress in the work in those few years that I have been here. When I came to Sing-in there were about twenty men coming to Sunday worship and three or four women sitting in a corner. Now we have a congregation of over 200 members, a fairly good Sunday School, Epworth League, three services Sundays and one in mid-week, all well attended, besides the class meetings. Our women's training school has enrolled twenty-three students this year, our girls' boarding school, twenty pupils. Besides, we have a day school with ten to fifteen girls and a few women, right here in our compound, too. In the district I have ten girls' day schools at different villages, and thirty-five villages with chapels where we have native Christians living and native preachers in charge. At ten places out of these thirty-five, I have trained Bible women stationed, who help the women, teach them to read, and see that they are brought to church. I have had, ever since December, revival meetings in the different chapels where the Christians of three or four villages come together. They bring their bedding and sleep in the church on the benches. My small organ attracts the attention of the heathen and we have a real old time meeting. Souls are brought to Christ. The day school in the country I can only visit each eight times a year, when I examine the students; or if my trip leads me past one, I stop and see how they are doing.

When at home in Sing-in, I give most of my strength to the women's school, where I have two good native teachers and a matron. I have also a clinic for the sick, and treat an average of two hundred patients per month. The girls' boarding school is under the care of Miss Nicoleise, the rest of the work being under my own care and responsibility. The Lord blesses us greatly.

I hope for three great things for the future. We need very much a large church. We worship now in a native house, but it is too small, and it pains me when I see people going away for lack of room. Our second need is a hospital. Third, we need a residence for missionaries. Miss Nicoleise and I live now in the women's schools; but if the work keeps on growing at the rate it does now, we will need more workers, and consequently a house for them to live in. So how I feel as though I will yet see all these buildings go up. When I came to China, not even land could be bought in Sing-in, now we have a beautiful plot, with two buildings, both of which went up under my direction—the school I had planned and all.

During the Boxer war, we were very anxious about our property and our Christians; yet God has protected us so wonderfully. I hope he will soon restore peace, so that China may become a Christian nation, for not until then can her people be reformed. Our Christians are very good and noble characters, who stood the test as "tried by fire" and kept faith; and I believe we build on a good foundation. I love the Chinese, and when they become God's people they are certainly a lovable people. J. E. MARTHA-LEBEUS.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Pilgrims to Mecca

ON the eastern shore of the Red Sea, about half way between Suez and Aden, is the port of Jiddah, at which Mohammedan pilgrims, who make the journey by sea, land on their way to Mecca, the birthplace of Mohammed. The scene when these pilgrims meet those who have come overland is one of the most wonderful spectacles in the world. No record is made of the travelers by land, but those who came by sea were counted at the annual pilgrimage of 1898 and were found to number 95,820. They come from China, Persia, India, Java, Russia, Turkey, Egypt, and many other lands. Mohammed made this pilgrimage compulsory, and it has been observed by his followers through all the centuries since his death. A motley crowd it is which assembles in Mecca. Stringent regulations are made as to the garments they shall wear, the things they may do and not do by the way, and the ceremonies they shall observe on their arrival. The objective point of the pilgrimage is the Kaaba, which, according to Mohammedan tradition, was first built by Adam, but was destroyed by the deluge and was rebuilt by Abraham and Ishmael. It is certainly very ancient and was used as an idolatrous shrine long before the time of Mohammed. It contains the famous black stone, probably an aerolite. Mohammedans believe that it was snow-white when it fell out of heaven, but was blackened by the touch of sin. The pilgrim must make the circuit of the Kaaba seven times, kissing the stone every time he passes it. He usually stays ten days, certain ceremonies being prescribed for each day. He then goes, if he can afford it, to Medina, seventy miles away, where Mohammed's tomb is. At the close he receives a certificate of his having duly performed the rite, and this he treasures, as it entitles him to enter Mecca, as he believes it does. Many lose their lives every year by diseases contracted during the pilgrimage. It is a pity that they should not know that in no such way can their souls be saved; as Christ told the woman of Samaria, it is not the place of worship, but the spirit of worship that avails.

One hour cometh, when ye shall stand near in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father in truth. The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him (John 4: 21-23).

A Twenty-Year Quest

A happy reunion took place at Troy, N. Y., recently. A father who has been searching for his infant daughter for upwards of twenty years found her a few days ago a grown woman in that city. In 1876, he was working in an iron foundry, where he was accidentally injured and was sent to a hospital. While he lay there hovering between life and death, his wife died, leaving a newborn daughter. A neighbor took charge of the child temporarily and became attached to it. As soon as the father was well enough to be consulted, the neighbor went to the hospital and told him that she was going with her husband, and would be glad to take the baby with her and formally adopt it. The father being unable to make any other provision for the child, consented. When he was able to leave the hospital he went to Scotland, in the hope that his native air would complete his recovery. He obtained work there and remained five years. When he returned to this country he made inquiries for the woman with whom he had left his child. He searched for her until all his money was exhausted, but failed to find her, owing to the fact that she had lost her husband and had married again. From that time forward, to find his child became his chief end in life. All the money he could save was spent in advertising for her and following clues. At last he has found her. The clue came through a little girl who talked so much about her Sunday School teacher, who had no father or mother, that the man, always hoping to discover his child, made her acquaintance, and discovered in her his long-lost daughter. She was working in a store, and was as delighted to find her father as he was to find his daughter. She had made no search for him and did not know that he was living, but she was deeply touched by his story of his long search for her. Her experience is like that of many Christians who were first drawn to God by learning that God loved them when they knew him not.

I was found of them that sought me not (Rom 10: 20).

Imperilled by Success

A significant story of "fisherman's luck" is told by a correspondent of a Philadelphia journal. The sportsmen who go every year to Bayside, N. J., for the fishing, have been disgusted this season by their failure. One of them, however, who is an enthusiast in the sport, remained after the others left, in the hope of a catch. He had been watching the net for hours, when he saw the floats suddenly swish around under the impetus of a heavy body. He knew at once that a big fish was enclosed, and began to pull in with energy. Just as he had the net well in hand, standing in the front of the boat, the fish gave a heavy lunge and broke away for freedom. The fisherman was taken by surprise, and the sudden jerk threw him off his balance into the water. Happily, a companion saw his predicament and threw him a line, by which he was drawn on board. Then, with the aid of his rescuer, he caught the net with a hook and captured the biggest sturgeon of the season. It was well for him that some one was near

The principle of their difficulty is a very ancient one and it affected the condition of the whole human race.

Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom (Job 33: 24).

Nearly Wrecked by a Rivet

A significant story is told by a New York agent who has just returned from South America. He was on board a steamer that was new and apparently sound. Yet during the voyage she filled rapidly with water, and it was only by the greatest exertions that she reached the harbor of Callao. When the ship went into the dock and was examined, it was found that one of the plates about the centre had worn through. Further investigation demonstrated that the damage had been done by a little copper rivet, which had been accidentally left in the bottom, and had rolled back and forth over the same spot so often and so long that the iron plate had been worn thin, and the pressure of the water had broken through. This is only another proof that a very small cause may lead to a very great disaster. That fact is often forgotten when men wonder at a life being wrecked for time and eternity. They do not remember that a sin, considered trivial, may do it.

Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all (James 2: 10).

A Strange Bee-Hive

A despatch from Washington, D. C., to the New York Sun, reports an extraordinary discovery. Repairs were being made in an old mansion in that city, now the home of an ex-Senator, whose family is prominent in society. On taking up one of the floors, it was found that the whole space between it and the ceiling of the floor below was packed full of honey in the comb. It appeared to be the accumulation of at least three years. In the rear of the building, on the outside, at the corner, there was a defective place in the masonry, leaving a small aperture. This the bees had used as an avenue to the vacant space, which they had turned into a hive. The ex-Senator's family must have been astonished to find that there had been a store of sweetness so near them for so long a time. It is true it was not that sweetness that the great teacher of our time thought so essential to a good life; but that, too, is nearer to us than many people think.

The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach (Romans 10: 8).

MOHAMMEDAN PILGRIMS RETURNING FROM MECCA

enough to save him, otherwise he might have lost his life in securing his prize. There are some who have lost their souls in that way. In trying to gain a fortune, they have been drawn into sin, and have sunk beyond redemption.

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36).

A Chinese Refugee

The Collector of the Port of San Francisco has appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury to sanction an evasion of the law which excludes Chinamen from landing on our shores. It appears that a prominent Chinaman named Su Chih Chin, recently took refuge on an American vessel in a Chinese port and was brought to San Francisco. The Chinese government has offered a large reward for his capture in order to punish him for an effort he made to induce his countrymen to depose the Empress Dowager and intrust the Emperor Kwang Hsu with supreme power. Under our law the Collector has no right to admit the refugee, as he has never been in America before, but the Collector rightly thinks it would be a cruel thing to send him back to China, where he would assuredly be put to death. Doubtless, the Secretary agrees with him, though both would desire to show respect for the law. They are merely executive officers whose duty it is to administer the law as it stands; but in this case they would be glad to find some way by which, while obeying the law, they could save the life of this worthy man.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered July 24

1. What is the total population of the world, from the Creation (assuming it to be a period of 5,000 years) until the present time?
2. Should a pastor be the superintendent of his own Sunday School?
3. Is it a lie to tell a very sick person that a friend "is well," when, in fact, he is dead, but you think the sick person will not be hurt by the sad news?
4. What rule should guide in deciding what is a just compensation for another's labor, instead of his dire necessity?
5. When Paul wrote (Romans 13: 1-7) that he who resisted the powers that be received to himself damnation, did he really mean to condemn revolution in every age—our own revolutionary war, for instance?

Questions of the Week

1. Is it right or wrong for a Christian to desire the good opinion of the world's people? If right, to what extent may he go to win and retain such good opinion?

It is not only right for Christians to desire the good will of worldly people, but, to a certain extent, it is their duty to cultivate it. Paul tells us in his epistle to the Romans 12: 17 (revised version), to "take thought for things honorable in the sight of all men." Our first thought should be to God, that our lives are strictly in accordance with his will, but as far as may be consistent with a godly life, we should strive to do nothing that may seem wrong or dishonorable in the sight of worldly people. Thus may we hope to influence them for good. HENRY C. WARE.

Let us go to God's Word for our answer. Christ says: "If the world hateth you, ye know it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you" (John 15: 18, 19). "And the world hated them because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17: 14). Paul says: "Whosoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10: 31). "Am I seeking to please men? If I were still pleasing men, I should not be a servant of Christ" (Gal. 1: 10). "The friendship of the world is enmity with God. Who-soever, therefore, would be a friend of the world maketh himself an enemy of God" (James 4: 4, 5). "Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake."

AMELIA BRADFORD.

It is hard to give an unqualified answer to this question either way. It is almost a necessity for a Christian to have the good opinion of the world's people in order to be successful in any kind of business, and yet Christ says, Luke 6: 24: "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you." While there is probably nothing wrong in a Christian's desiring this good opinion and to seek after it, drawing the line sharply at any compromise with sin, yet it would be very apt to become a "weight," or a hindrance to the Christian life, and Paul says these things had better be laid aside. A better way would be to seek to please God and live a sincere Christian life, and then he would command the respect of the majority and the good opinion of the better class, and then would be fulfilled the prophecy, Prov. 16: 7, "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." A. A. FORSTER.

2. Are we morally bound to educate the negro?

We are. I maintain such obligation, after having spent all my life amid a large negro population, generally in places where that race predominates several to one. We are morally bound to educate him, just as to educate any other ignorant, but permanent element in society. A slum might remedy itself by being scattered and assimilated with healthy and decent communities. But the negro is a permanent factor, and the ignorance of the race will not remedy itself. It is our duty to educate him, because it is our duty to educate all persons who are ignorant. It is our duty also, because the need is very great. Such obligation has been recognized by the legislatures of the South and, inadequate as the provision often is, there has probably never been appropriation so disproportionate to taxes paid, made by legislative provision anywhere else in our governmental history. It is our duty to consider it, not as a desert; but as the necessity of those whose citizenship must be affected.

C. P. ATKINSON.

No. We are not morally bound to do so.

the confirmation of it at human hands. Especially is the laying on of hands objectionable. It only serves to remind the spectator of the power which it once had but has now lost. No one supposes that the Holy Spirit can thus be given and it is only silly to pretend to do it. The real significance of ordination is in the prestige it gives the candidate, who afterwards comes to the churches with the formal approval of his predecessors. As Moses appointed Joshua to succeed him and carry forward the work he must leave unfinished, so the torch that honored preachers have borne to their generation is placed in the hands of the candidate that he may bear it to his generation. It is thus an Apostolic succession that may help the candidate to gain the respect and attention of people who believe in its validity. E. C. EDWARDS.

Ordination directs the pastor's thought forcibly, systematically, to Christian doctrine as a whole. He is likely to view truth in such relations and proportions as he otherwise would not for a long time. Ordination sets a man apart to exalted duties. He has thus a formal, orderly entrance into a noble profession; more than this, his work is set above a profession as a divine calling. Ordination makes the individual consciously and not; but the communion is the Lord's table and he does not exclude any one. A pastor or church official, as God's representative on earth, might on that ground take the authority to say who is a worthy communicant unless the person is living in open sin. It is difficult to see how they could decide on his relationship to God, and even then at person might have sought and found forgiveness during the service that usually precedes the communion. Pastors should earnestly warn any from partaking of the Lord's supper "unworthily," as explained in 1 Cor. 11, but I don't think any one is justified in going any further than that. A. A. FORSTER.

5. If the chairman of a company, or a stockholder, whose name has been influential in attracting stockholders, discovers that the company is likely to fail, is he justified in resigning and selling out, without acquainting the public with his reasons?

No, emphatically. The laws of a number of the States do not relieve a person of his obligations to creditors by the sale of his stock in a bank, when in a failing condition. If in the eyes of the civil law such act is criminal, it must follow that the moral is higher, and the sentiment that places the statute on the books is higher and says it is wrong. In other words, deception is always wrong. A. N. LEFFINGWELL.

How to Start a Local China Famine Relief Committee

A number of people have written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stating that they would like to start a China Famine Relief Committee in their town, and asking for information concerning the best mode of procedure.

We should say that the first thing to do is to write down a number of names of public-spirited men and women, and to each of these address an invitation about as follows:

Kind Friend:

A sore famine has visited China. Millions of men, women, and children in Shansi and other provinces are affected. Multitudes must die of starvation unless help is promptly sent them. I am endeavoring to form a Relief Committee, and earnestly invite your co-operation. Will you serve as a member? Systematic effort will speedily result in generous contributions, and our community will thus be represented in this great international life-saving work. I enclose circular setting forth China's great need.

A meeting for the purpose of forming such a Relief Committee will be held in the parlor of (or lecture room of Church, or some other place adapted to the requirements) on Wednesday evening next, at eight o'clock. We are sure that we may count on your practical sympathy and hearty co-operation, and hope that you will find it convenient to join us in this movement.

Very cordially yours,

Send this letter to at least double the smallest number you may think sufficient to constitute the Committee. If possible, before you prepare the circular, get three or four clergymen of your town to join you in sending out the call, and at the same time to supply you with a goodly number of very desirable names to whom it may be addressed.

Before the meeting, write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for such literature as it may be able to provide, for the purpose of informing yourself on the real status of the China famine and the latest news concerning it, also, for leaflets for distribution on the occasion of the meeting. Get some of the clergymen to agree to talk on the occasion and encourage the work and settle with them as to which one of those present shall be called temporarily to the Chair during the organization proceedings. Then elect a Chairman, Vice-Chairman, a Secretary, one Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer. Let the Treasurer, if possible, be an officer of a bank. Then elect a Press Committee, whose duty it shall be to call up on the newspapers of your town, and ask them to give the widest publicity to the famine needs and to the proceedings of your Relief Committee; also arrange with them to publish the names of all contributors, together with the amount contributed by them. Then appoint another sub-committee to visit all the Young People's Societies and all the churches, and persuade them to take an active hand in this grand and glorious work.

Each church may have its own sub-committees to operate among its own members and to report to the General China Famine Relief Committee. This will result in a series of operations that must be crowned with success and must induce numerous contributions for the cause. As soon as some money has been contributed, and as often as the treasurer of the fund may deem proper, send a remittance on account to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the money may be cabled immediately to China and do the work for which it was contributed. Thus, ten dollars collected to-day in your State, and sent on to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, reaching here the day following, may, the very next morning, be doing its work in China. Don't keep the money in the treasury, but let it immediately start on its work of beneficence. Every day's delay must result in loss of human life.

Each person is God's free man if he so acknowledges himself. We will desire to educate the negro because we love the race, and not because bound to do it. It is true the white people brought the negro here, and for our interest in them and our love for our country, we should desire to educate them. LYDIA WARD.

Whether we are or not, we are educating them. In the South alone, more than seventy millions of dollars have been contributed to negro education since 1865, and in the North quite large sums have been given for the same purpose. If we are morally bound to create a more intelligent citizenship, we are morally bound to educate the negro. J. W. HAMNER.

3. Since in the present time no one has the power possessed by the Apostles of imparting the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands, is there any benefit to a pastor in being ordained?

There is no intrinsic value in the ceremony. Men cannot really ordain now, as the Apostles did. It is God who ordains, and many of his most successful servants, such as the late C. H. Spurgeon and D. L. Moody, were content with his ordination, without accepting of public record a part of a body, pursuing common ends. He is helped to become, what every pastor should be, not only an officer of a limited society, but a preacher of righteousness to all people. H. M. DOUGLAS.

4. If a person desires to come to the communion table to obey his Lord's command, is a pastor or officer of a church justified in excluding him, on the ground of heresy, or past sin?

Yes. If the heresy be the denial of the divinity of Christ, or some of the other always-held essential doctrines of the church, a pastor is justified in excluding him. If not, he encourages the spread of false doctrine. If the one who has committed the past sin has repented of the same, he can rightly be admitted to the communion table. He can be forgiven "seventy times seven," and be restored to full communion. But the pastor should be sure as possible that the repentance is real. That is the teaching of St. Paul in writing to the Corinthians. A. DE R. MEARES.

I can find nothing in the Bible to justify such an action. A Church undoubtedly has the right to establish ceremonials and festivals, and say who shall attend and who shall

Miscellaneous Questions

Jere. R., Natchez, Miss. When was Christianity first introduced in China?

According to the most authentic records, the Nestorians brought Christianity into China between 600 and 800 A.D., some authorities say even earlier. A Nestorian named Olopur, was the pioneer. He is said to have appeared in China during the Tang dynasty. Protestant missionary work began under the London Missionary Society about 1796.

Constant Reader. A poor debtor gives his creditor all he owns, viz., mining shares of little value, to pay his outlawed debt. Several years later the shares suddenly advanced in value a thousandfold. After the creditor has fully satisfied his claim, should he keep the remainder or return part to his old debtor?

The creditor would probably be legally entitled to retain the whole, as at the time it was given to him it was of little more value than the amount of the debt. In equity, however, and especially if he be a Christian, he will feel bound not to profit by his debtor's misfortune, but will return the surplus over and above the amount of the debt and interest.

BUSY SUNSHINERS AND THEIR WORK

Put some sunshine in your faces,
 Shades and shadows cast away,
 Of drear gloom dispel the traces,
 Hope and brightness,—let these stay.

SO sings John G. Quinius in one of his "Good Cheer" poems, and that is what we all are trying to do. Mr. Quinius was surely thinking of our Sunshine creed and our motto "Good cheer," when he wrote his sunshine poem, for he concludes in this way:

Then this power to do a kindness,
 Given us by God's own hand,
 Like a fountain in the desert,
 Sheds its blessing o'er the land.

We who have been working in Sunshine, learned long ago that our little deeds of kindness daily brought us unexpected blessings. When we write a letter of good cheer, the answer always fills us with delight, and we generally cease to wonder why the Sunshine Society flows. There is something so very beautiful in the Sunshine creed that it can't help appealing to all—rich, poor, young and old, alike. In trying to live up to the object of the Society, viz: To perform kind and helpful deeds and bring the sunshine of happiness into the greatest number of hearts and homes, we find that the reflected light of our own good cheer is much brighter than that which we tried to shed.

Everyone who wears the Sunshine badge should send for an enrollment blank and start a circle of ten or more members for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Branch. At the time of the annual meeting this branch was the youngest in the International Society; next year, we want to show that our Sunshiners are not behind in all doing. Let us swell our enrollment of a hundred names to thousands. The membership fee is "some" or suggestion that will carry sunshine," and this must be reported before anyone's name can be entered in the International books. There are countless ways of giving good cheer, and everybody has his own individual opportunity. There is no charity in Sunshine; therefore, armed with a Sunshine badge and led with the spirit of love, the members find themselves in a position to do much more good than they could do if not connected with the I. S. S.

"What is that pin you are wearing?" asked a lady of Mrs. John Lewis Childs, who was spending a few weeks at a mountain resort.

"Why, that is my Sunshine badge," she exclaimed.

"Sunshine," said the first speaker. "Then I think there is work for you right here in this hotel. There is a young gentleman here very ill indeed, and, by unexpected sickness, finds himself stranded and among strangers. We have been at our wits' end to know what to do. To offer him money as an object of charity, the doctor says would be a death-blow, and if he goes on worrying over his present state of affairs, he will surely die. What can we do? Is there any way Sunshine can get around our difficulties?"

"Of course," said Mrs. Childs. "I wish I had known of this sooner."

Pointing to her Sunshine badge and explaining its meaning, she talked with the guests of the hotel, taking the name and address of each one who responded to her call for Sunshine. Then in an hour from the time she learned of the young man's dilemma, she was standing by his bedside saying:

"Here are $60.00 Sunshine money that you will have to take, or else I lose my membership in the Sunshine Society."

"You see," and she went on explaining, "I have just heard about you. You are to take this money, and pay the doctor's bill, and settle up with the hotel, and get strong enough in one day to be put on the train for home. These are the addresses of the Sunshiners who have tried to do a kind deed. (You know that is what we promise to do when we join the society.) When you get strong and well, you can write them."

"Sunshine!" murmured the young man. "I have heard about the society. It is not a charity, is it?"

"Oh, dear, no! You have got to pay every bit of this back. Not in money, exactly, unless you can afford it, but you are to 'do something for somebody quick' the minute you are able to. Do you understand?"

"I do," said the young man, and, with a happy smile, he added, "I shall see to it that my dues are paid before the week is out." Then he fell into the first natural sleep he had for some time.

There will be a Sunshine Day at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo. The date is October 12. Saturday was selected in order that the school teachers and high school scholars might attend. A hearty invitation is extended to all Sunshine members to be present. There will be a programme of speaking and music, followed by a reception tendered by the Buffalo members to all visitors.

At a special meeting of the Executive Board of the International Sunshine Society, it was unanimously resolved that each branch be requested to celebrate, once a year, a day to be known as International Day. This will be a gathering for the purpose of raising funds for the yearly branch dues of "One dollar or more" as suggested in the constitution. The entire receipts of the day will constitute the annual dues of your circle, and can be forwarded to your branch president to help defray current expenses.

SUNSHINE NOTES

Miss Jessie M. Hixson, a Sunshine member and head worker in the King's Daughters House in Harlem, 216 East 128th street, New York City, makes a call for furniture for the Home. A bed-room and sitting-room should be furnished by Sunshiners, and then there is a great need of floor covering, such as mats, rugs, and carpets. Curtains, portieres and pictures will be heartily welcomed. A wheel-chair with low arms is badly needed by an invalid. Clothing of any kind can be utilized to great advantage.

A Sunshine branch in Robinson Springs, Alabama, Mrs. Emily Verdery Battey, president, has started a free circulating library for Sunshiners. One of the old Southern mansions has been given for this purpose, and anyone desiring to add a book to this collection, that it will be appreciated as long as it lasts, will please send direct to Mrs. Battey. She will acknowledge receipt.

Anybody answering these calls will please notify THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Branch President, Miss Susan Parsons, 92 Bible House, New York City, and the name of the contributor will be entered on the International books as a member in good standing.

HEARTS FEEL FOR CHINA

W. R. G., Los Angeles, Cal. ($5), writes:

Your appeal on behalf of the famine-stricken in China is most praiseworthy and opportune, and I thank the Lord for giving me the means to help a little in doing what I trust will in the aggregate prove to be a blessing to that benighted country.

C. L. C., Kingston, Ill. ($3), writes:

I pray God may help them to come into his light and that his people may do their whole duty in helping to save them.

G. W. P., Indianola, Ind. ($5), writes:

May God bless the gift and sanctify the receivers in spirit, while being nourished in body.

"May God bless every dollar of the Fund," writes E. C. H., Providence, R. I. ($6); "and make it the means of winning souls for his kingdom."

A Friend, Leon, Ia. ($1.10), writes:

The ten cents is from my little boy, six years old. He was saving for the Fourth of July, but I want to teach him to remember the suffering when he is small, and to plan so as to be able to divide with them.

Mrs. Henrietta W. B., Pleasant Hill, Oreg. ($1.25), writes:

It is only a widow's mite that I give. God will surely bless it, as he blesses me and mine every day.

Mr. and Mrs. M. L. D., Holstein, Ia. ($10), write:

May it be through this agency that America can reach the hearts of these people, and their souls be saved.

Equally beautiful is the sentiment in the letter of Mrs. Alanson D., Brighton, Wis. ($3):

Now may all preach the Gospel to the heathen by returning good for evil.

From Mrs. Stephen S., Oshkosh, Wis., comes this letter with a gift:

Your urgent appeal for the starving people of Shansi, confirmed by Minister Conger and copied in our Northwestern Christian Advocate, Chicago, of last week, calls forth the sympathy, and I trust the help, of every Christian heart.

"With a grateful heart we send our mite," ($1) writes Mrs. C. H., Brockville, Ont., "which, with God's blessing, we hope may do a little for some suffering sister or brother in China."

"His Word says: 'He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord,' and his Word I believe, and thus would bring forth its fruit," writes Alfred C. G. Newark, N. J., ($5).

"May our dear Lord touch the hearts of all who can give largely to provide abundantly for all the suffering," writes Miss Lucy S. ($1), Pelham, N. Y.

"I pray the Lord to open the hearts of those who have wealth, that they, out of their abundance, may cast it into the Lord's treasury for the benefit of the poor, suffering Chinese," writes C. G. M., Kirby, Pa. ($1).

"Truly those starving people need relief," writes Mrs. Donald M., of North Burns, Mich., in forwarding her gift of $10 to the fund.

H. M. R., Stalbird, N. Y. ($1), writes:

With the prayer that the good Lord may so move the hearts of those that can help that this suffering may speedily be closed, and that out of it glory may come to the Giver of all good and the nation now suffering be brought to the feet of our blessed Master, Jesus.

VERY large proportion of the letters received during the week in relation to the China Famine Relief work, contain strong expressions of sympathy with the movement for the rescue of the famine sufferers. Extracts given below from some of the letters, are fairly characteristic of all.

A friend in San Angelo, Tex. ($1), writes:

This seems a pitiful sum where so much is needed; but is sent from the scanty income of a large family, and is given with the hope of doing spiritual good as well as physical.

Here is a note from a wee sympathizer, which should not pass unrecorded:

OTTERCLIFFE, ONT., CAN.

Dear Editor:—This little girl, having heard of the China famine, has offered the enclosed one dollar from her savings bank for the relief of the starving children in China.

RHEA CROWTHER (aged 5).

Little Rhea's dollar will buy food for some poor, suffering Chinese family, and may even be the means of saving their lives. A noble record for a little maid of five.

Sarah P., Lakeland, Fla. ($2), writes:

China is truly an open door for the entrance of Christian principles and teachings. May God move the people to undant help.

"It is hard to keep the tears back," writes Miss Frances K., of Rochester, N. Y. ($1). "I pity the Chinese very much. We ought to be thankful to our heavenly Father for a land like ours where we always have plenty, and that we are able to help those who are sick. They are God's children, and our brothers and sisters."

OUR FIRST MEDALIST

AFTER careful and conscientious consideration by the committee in New York City, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Medal for Personal Heroism has been awarded to William Rohrer, of Delta, Pa., in recognition of his brave and humane act in rescuing Oliver Weiser from death by drowning, on January 4. As his portrait shows, our medalist is but a lad, yet from a large and gallant company of heroes and heroines, he was chosen as the one to whom, all things considered, the highest honors were due. His name, and the deed for which this award was made, were brought to our notice by Mr. Oliver Weiser, Sr., Postmaster at Delta, in the following letter:

"January 4, at close of school, a number of children repaired to Ramsay's Pond to skate. The pond was eight to ten feet deep. At some distance from the bank, the ice gave way under my son, Oliver, and he was submerged his head and shoulders alone excepted. He struggled a number of times to climb upon the ice, but as often it broke under his weight, the hole widening with his efforts. William Rohrer, a lad of fourteen, threw himself flat upon his stomach and began to crawl towards Ollie, directing his comrades to catch him and each other in turn by the feet until a human chain should be formed to the bank. It was a desperately hard and dangerous task for the brave boy and his brave helpers, but they succeeded in getting my son from under the ice and safely to shore. During the progress of the work, Rohrer was in imminent peril, as he must have known he would be when he started out to save Ollie. He became partially submerged, and it looked as if he, too, would be lost under the ice, but he never once relaxed his grip on Ollie. What adds to the value of his noble and unselfish deed is the fact that the two boys have heretofore been opponents and antagonists; their quarrelings twice resulting in Rohrer's having his head badly cut by stones, on one occasion necessitating the services of a surgeon in repairing the wound. His bravery is all the more creditable in that he sunk all personal differences in the hour of danger and trouble, and imperiled his life to save another's. William is a manly little fellow, in knickerbockers, and, when not at school, is working to help support his mother and little sisters. His struggle with poverty has been as faithful and earnest as was his effort to save my son."

Rev. J. R. Ramsey, of Delta, wrote: "William Rohrer, who rescued Oliver Weiser, is a member of my Sunday School class, and is an intelligent and industrious lad. William's companions write, describing the scene, mending his bravery, and showing great delight over the hope that our medal would be conferred upon him. He says: 'The ice was not safe, and we would not go on the pond, and advised Ollie not to.' Another writes: 'Ollie Willie was crawling out to Ollie, the ice would break under him as he lay upon it.'"

Ollie, the little impulsive, thoughtful, but not ungovernable lad, who was saved, pays whole-souled tribute to this rescuer in a long letter, written with painstaking regularity. "When Willie caught hold of me," he says, "my weight nearly pulled him in, but he wouldn't let go."

Among candidates for our medal were young men and maidens, little children and aged ones who had sworn themselves ready to risk their own lives that others might be saved. To choose from among them was like plucking the brightest jewel from a treasury blindfolded eyes. One fact determined award in Rohrer's favor. Others had faced death for kindred, friend, and even for strangers; he imperiled his life to save his "opponent and antagonist"—one who had struck him; the magnanimity of no other act measured up to this. In another issue we will speak of others who must receive honorable mention. In sending accounts of brave deeds, readers will remember that our heroes and heroines must come from the ranks of everyday life and outside of the ranks of paid or professional service, such as firemen and policemen. Give name, address, and if possible, photograph of hero or heroine. Address Chairman Medal Committee, Bible House, N. Y.

Some Mistakes of Mothers

MOTHERS, bless their dear hearts, are often too ready to let themselves be effaced. They are so generous in their estimate of their children's powers that they underrate their own. Besides, sacrifice is a mother's daily breath, the habit of her life. It began when she first felt the growing new life within her own, it continued in the anguish of the birth-hour, and through infancy and childhood her children so depended upon her, so rested in her never ceasing, never grudging love, that they became accustomed to seeing her deny herself, and accepted her kindness without much recognition. A young mother once said that the first time in her life she had an adequate idea of what her mother had done and endured for her, was when she bore her baby; "then," she added, "I knew what motherhood meant."

In some households, the mother, though ostensibly mistress, has really very little to say about the home management. Molly and Katie decide the arrangement of the rooms, their company fills the parlors, their taste decrees the decoration if new paper and paint are ordered, and theirs is the pervading influence in the home routine. Little by little, the mother has been crowded out of her proper place; she stays at home and packs picnic baskets; she irons the pretty summer frocks and saves up her money that her girls may go on excursions; they have the soft side and she the hard, and they never seem to see that she is weary and worn, and old before her time, through the monotony of life.

Don't think I blame the daughters, when the mother has thus weakly laid aside her sceptre and crown. They are less culpable than she. A mother should hold her own, and never permit herself to be pushed into the background, even by the affectionate solicitude of her child. It often happens that the middle-aged mother lapses into old age too soon, simply through this latter mistake. She likes to go to prayer-meeting, but on a rainy evening, father is tired, and the children are not disposed to give up their engagements to be her companions. So when in these days, a good many of our young people do not realize that they have a duty toward the older people's prayer-meeting, fancying that their Christian Endeavor has been enough to fill their measure of obligation. So, when mother puts on her overshoes and her rain-cloak, there is apt to be a chorus of disapproval. "Why, you're never going out to-night? It's just pouring; you'll be wet through. You'll have to wait. They'll think you crazy!" and he like. The mother is made uncomfortable whether she goes or stays, and if she be well and vigorous, she would much better carry out her original purpose than forego it. If a boy or girl have to insist on being her escort, let her graciously accept, otherwise, let her trollop on two independent feet of her own. I believe strongly in mothers holding their ground, keeping their standing-room, and in their being queens of the home realm to the end.

If there is an opposite kind of mother, whose errors lie in a quite different direction. This mother is rather penitently than conciliatory in disposition, and she has never discovered that her children have grown up. She insists that to every human being arrives a day when leaping-strings are no longer in order. Her sons may love her dearly, but they must face their individual temptations and confront their personal foes, and struggle with their besetting sins in the arena of life. There comes a time when a man must say "Yes" or "No" for himself. A young woman may feel herself so strongly urged or driven to a course of action that, when listening respectfully to her mother's counsel, she must still decide a matter for herself. An over-dominant mother sometimes dwarfs and arrests the womanly development of daughters who have never dared to depend upon themselves.

Less often seen, but occasionally met, is the type of mother who overshadows her daughters by her superior wit, beauty and animation, and who never gives them a fair show. "I wanted to marry Hannah S—," said a man one day, "and I called again and again at her house. I was really very much interested. But I could make no progress. Whenever I went to the S. home, Madame Mere not only came into the parlor to greet me, but stayed the entire evening. I could not get a chance to meet Hannah herself. Her mother was charming, but she kept the young men off as effectually as if she had been a dragon." All the girls in Hannah's set married, but she was doomed to spinsterhood, because one by one her admirers grew tired of trying to break down her mother's guard.

Mothers should not fail in politeness to their boys and girls of any age. Nor should they give all the petting to the babe in arms and to the tiny toddler, whose

Intemperance Among Women

THE charge is made that intemperance among women is far more frequent than it used to be, and that fashionable women resort to drugs, and stimulants, much more openly and daringly than would once have been thought possible. The glass of wine or beer on a restaurant table beside the place of a lady is not now unusual, and it is certainly a matter of regret that the victims of cocaine, morphia, and other sedatives are to be found in homes of wealth and luxury.

Women are so much at the mercy of their nervous organization, that they should be more than careful in making a crutch of any narcotic or stimulant which promises a temporary relief from pain or weariness. The aid rendered is swift, it may be, at the moment, but it is always succeeded by reaction, and still worse, by a peremptory demand for further indulgence. By imperceptible degrees the evil habit grows, becomes fixed, and binds its chains upon the person who thought herself free.

What an agony of shame and remorse must sweep over a woman who awakens to the knowledge that she has heedlessly bartered her birthright of honor for a mess of pottage. A son who has believed in and loved his mother, must have a pang of unutterable woe, if he discover her unworthiness, and her control by a base appetite. The point of safety is in the very beginning, and any one who would remain pure, and strong, will for her own sake, and for that of her children, abstain from experiments in which danger lurks.

An inherited appetite may sleep in some constitutions, never to give trouble unless stirred up by foolish tampering with the forbidden thing. This is especially the case with the opium habit, than which nothing is more degrading and less likely to be overcome when once formed.

Womanly Work

That convicts deserve their fate, and that maudlin sympathy with deliberate law-breakers is weak and morbid, are self-evident. Yet in every man, however depraved, there lingers some good, or there is, untouched, a chord which may vibrate to the melodies of better things than he has known. Men are criminals by inheritance, by association, or by environment. Prisons and penitentiaries instead of reforming them and giving them another chance, often destroy their lingering manliness, crush their ambition, and send them out, when their time is over, to prey upon society again. Few persons will trust the ex-convict, or believe in his reformation. The angel of the prison, such a woman as Elizabeth Fry in the past, or as Maud Ballington Booth in the present, sets herself to encourage the fallen man to begin anew. She brings to him womanly counsel, and the sense of human help in the very sound of her voice and the touch of her hand. Not only does she hearten him to bear the consequences of his guilt without whining and complaint, but she points to him some reasonable hope of a renovated future; shows him that he may one day start again and enter upon a new and honorable career.

A Baby's Waking

Nothing is so sweet as a baby waking in the morning, fresh and rosy from sleep. The little mother has been up for hours, going to and fro about her work, and even taking time to twine a birthday wreath for her little one, and to hang it on his chair.

Sometimes mothers fancy that they are very hard-worked, and that life is full of care and trouble and toil; but if they could realize it, they would all know that this is their easiest and most beautiful time. Mother's arms are a refuge for the baby in every distressful hour. In years to come, this fair child may taste cups of bitterness which no mother's love can sweeten. Dear mother, wherever you are, hold your baby close and thank God for his gift of this treasure to-day.

sweet lip and pattering feet make so swift an appeal to the heart. The big boy, with hands and feet out of proportion to his size, the awkward, weedy-looking girl, just now an ugly duckling, need their mother's demonstrated love, her kisses and caresses and her mother-brooding as they may not have needed them in the earlier years.

"As one whom his mother comforteth," saith the Scripture. Dear mothers, ask God every day to give you grace to be comforters indeed, patient with the erring, faithful, loving and just in all your relation to the family group.

SUFFER THEM TO COME

Suffer the little children, said the Loving One of old,
To come in the bloom of their spring-time, to come to my tender breast;

Suffer the little children, like lambs to the evening fold
To run to the tender shepherd, who will give them peace and rest.

OUR WAIFS AND THEIR HELPERS

NEXT week our Children's Home will open. How much joy that sentence has carried into tenement homes, to tired, anxious mothers, and to eager, ragged, hungry little people of the poor, none can realize so fully as those who bear the message down to Cherry and Hester and Clinton streets, and various crowded quarters where people live thick as bees in a hive. Already, in stifling, malodorous courts and alleys, and stuffy rooms, little ones are drooping with the heat, and suffering sadly from other evil conditions.

The Fresh Air Editor wishes for a whole page of the paper, instead of a column, in which to tell about this beautiful work. There are three sides to it—the waifs down in the tenements a-quiver with anticipation, the lovely home being made ready for little guests, the kind friends, East, West, North and South, who are helping us to bring blessings into the sorrowful lives of the little children of the poor, and every side of it is full of interest. Is not the following a charming story? A few days ago, a pretty doll, whose eyes open and shut, daintily dressed, came to this office. On her pink gown was pinned a card with the name "Daisy," and this is the letter dollie brought:

The "Daisy Band," composed of nine little girls, from six to twelve years old, have been busy sewing for some time, to send one waif to Mont-Lawn. Their work was blessed beyond their expectations, and they are happy to send you $10. They have dressed a doll for the little girl they hoped to send. So if one little heart may be made happy by the dollie, and three by the outing, we will feel well repaid for our work. God bless the Children's Home! Signed: Mrs. E. C. G., for "Daisy Band."

There was solemn council over whom we should give that doll to. If out of a hundred children at the Bible House, ready to go to Mont-Lawn, we give one a doll, how will ninety-nine feel? The problem was solved when Miss Irwin, Head-Worker at the Gospel Settlement, presented the name of a little deaf and dumb girl. The ninety-nine will rejoice with us and the Daisy Band, that she should have it. The following are typical of the many letters which encourage us:

P. A. A., Newport, R. I., $36: May this bring cheer and comfort to twelve little waifs for ten days! $15 I gathered from Christian friends, and $21 from a club of six little girls, who worked industriously and held a sale, being helped by their friend, Mrs. G. H. C. May God bless the Home! —"Perseverance," Orange, N. J., $3: Seven or eight little girls who live in the country wanted to give some city child the benefit of ten days in the country, and began last October to save pennies for this purpose. —A. W., Mennonite Mission, Cantonment, Okla., $3.75: Given by the Sunday School at Cantonment. —E. L. R., $30: To make ten waifs happy. —H. W. B., Pleasant Hill, Ore., $3: We, country people, thank God! have plenty of pure fresh air, and good milk and butter for our children, and last, but not least, gardens full of lovely flowers—such as only Oregon can grow. I want to help one tenement waif to experience some such blessings as our children know. —M. E. W., Saratoga, Calif., $3: To give one little lad an outing at Mont-Lawn, where he will get not only a breath of pure air, but a breath of the knowledge of God's love from the Christian teachings of that consecrated Children's Home.

In Monrovia

MANY of our readers are familiar with the missionary labors of Miss Mary Sharp among the Kroomen in West Africa, where she has been a pioneer in work for the Master, and these will read with peculiar interest the following letter from Miss Sharp. It is dated "Monrovia, April 19," and is addressed to Miss Nina Householder, of Staten Island, to whose courtesy we are indebted for the privilege of its publication.

Your letter, with such a generous proposal of assuming the support of another Kroo child, came this week. I will select a nice, bright little girl and name her Rachel—a favorite name with me. My first woman convert was given the name of Rachel. She is a good, earnest Christian woman. Your Eric (the Kroo boy Miss Householder had adopted) fell downstairs to-night. The children like to eat after dark—all Krootown eats after dark. To-night he and three others that sleep downstairs had slipped upstairs at bedtime, taking food with them. I called to one of them to know why there was so much noise overhead, and Eric, in his haste to come down, took a tumble. It would be easier to get another boy for you than a girl. Boys can be gotten readily; in fact parents beg me to take their boy "to teach him book sabbie [knowledge] and God palaver [talk about God], so he not grow up fool all same as me." But—"No, not girls; they bring sass." That is, girls trained in missions don't care to become second, third or fourth wife to a heathen man. So they "bring sass"—i. e., get independent.

Girls are usually sold very early for wives, the man paying on the installment plan, often taking her when eight or ten years old and putting her under his "head wife," to be trained to wait on him. There is no ceremony of any kind when they take the girls as wives.

Still, I have quite a number of girls. One pretty-featured little maid followed me up from school yesterday. She said her "Be" [mother] said she might stay with me; but I told her to go back until I could see her mother. To-day, after school, my boys and girls, who teach with me, started home while I was talking to some one, so that I had no one to interpret for me. It takes so long to teach them English just in day school; then, if they are not taken away from their surroundings, they grow up amid heathen superstition, and while their people seem pleasant outwardly, there is so much that is evil and unclean in their deeds and speech! I teach at home until one, then go down to Krootown and teach three hours. Of course, it is the hottest part of the day when I go down, but the heat does not affect me, though I think this is the hottest season I've known in Africa.

Oh, the moral and spiritual waste that needs to be cultivated in Krootown! Yet there has been a greater change than I had imagined could take place during this generation. We are not slow to point out the weak points in their "witch" or "demon" power. Soon after Christmas, seventeen persons came quite a distance from here and gave out that they were going to "play" for three months. In "playing," they beat their tomtoms, dress up fantastically, and gyrate, gesticulate, march and swing to and fro in a sort of dance. They brought with them a big "witch man" to "make medicine" to protect them from witches while here. I prayed earnestly that something might prevent their coming, and when here that in some way the play might be broken up. But it went on and on, the people giving themselves over to frolic. When it closed, the "witch man," whom they believed was powerful to protect them from evil, was paralyzed on one side and could not speak, nor could he go back with them. He still lives, but his condition has done more to break up belief in witches than I could have effected in a year or more. I could not but thank God that the "witch power" was broken so effectually, while praying for his pity on this poor creature. Oh, such thralldom as these people are in through believing that an evil power is ever on their track to kill, bring sickness and every other ill that one can name!

When one dies, a fire is built outside the house, and tomtoms are beat to scare away the evil power that will drag the spirit to dismal abodes, where it goes on and on, driven from one evil beast to another. Heathenism is fearful! Knowing it, one can appreciate the bright hope that Jesus brings.

THE SECRET PLACE

In the secret of his presence
How my soul delights to hide!
Oh, how precious are the lessons
Which I learned at Jesus' side!

Earthly cares can never vex me,
Nor can trials lay me low;
If Satan comes to tempt me,
To the secret place I go.

FOUND LIGHT IN THE PROMISES

Rev. Dr. J. W. Bashford, President of the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio, Became a Christian

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

THE Ohio Wesleyan University has been a great hive for evangelical Christianity for many years. It has been the scene of more conversions to Christ, and has sent forth more students to be ministers of the Gospel, than perhaps any other college west of the Alleghenies, if not in the entire country, in the last thirty years. Dr. Manssauls, of Chicago; Dr. Jefferson, of New York, and other men of scarcely less brilliancy in almost every city in the country, acknowledge the source of their spiritual power in the great revivals in Delaware.

The Ohio Wesleyan University has never had a leader who was more spiritual and whose influence was more of a tion; but his kindly interest in him deepened his conviction. Dr. Bashford says: "When I reach heaven, I shall hunt up that minister and thank him for his unselfish interest in a stubborn young stranger, who was not polite enough to thank him or even to learn his name."

When he reached the depot at the seat of the University, a fellow student, the Rev. W. C. Damon, now preaching in a church near Washington, joined him and helped carry his valise to his room, and on the way began a conversation with him upon religion. To the young man this seemed like fate. It seemed impossible to escape from his conscience. His mother's face haunted him, as he saw it in their last conversation; and his conviction for sin grew deeper while waiting for the second term to open.

At the opening of the winter term, D. L. Moody came from Chicago to Madison, Wis., and preached one evening in the Assembly Chamber. Bashford went to hear him, and realized his moral cowardice to such an extent during the sermon, that he resolved to confess Christ openly, at whatever cost, by responding to any invitation he might give. Mr. Moody closed the meeting abruptly with a brief prayer and the youth again escaped open commitment; but his conviction was so deepened that it brought him to a decision to take some action.

The next week, he went to the College prayer meeting—a small gathering attended by some fifteen students and held in one of the recitation rooms. The student in charge of the meeting seemed frightened by the unexpected presence of young Bashford and an unconverted senior, and Bashford was frightened by the presence of the senior. He had never heard of a revival at the University, and he soon saw that no invitation would be given to seek the Lord. Hence, just before the boys knelt down to pray, he rose and asked them to pray for him. The senior immediately arose and made a similar request. The leader asked Damon to take charge of the meeting, and he had them all kneel down together, and called on the senior and Bashford to pray first. They both prayed. The senior was converted, but Bashford experienced no change. Damon touched the heart of the matter in a moment, by saying that he must consent to preach. Bashford said that he would preach if the Lord would only save him; but Damon insisted that he had not surrendered fully, and quietly told him that he must preach the next Sunday at the county jail, where Damon was serving as chaplain. In his desperation, he accepted these hard terms, and went with him to the jail feeling like a prisoner, but thinking he would be saved if he only fulfilled that condition. He assured the prisoners that he was not a Christian, and then urged them to become Christians with him. Three or four men began the Christian life that morning and were converted before the young men left the jail. He found some slight peace because he had surrendered and ceased fighting against his conscience; but he had no experience of personal salvation.

Looking back on it, Dr. Bashford now thinks his surrender was fully made when he preached at the jail; but in some strange way he neglected the matter of faith. Months passed by in this unsatisfactory condition, until he came to a time of great illness, and his life was despaired of. Then, in his weakness, for the first time in his life, the promises of the Bible, which he had learned as a child, became direct messages of God to his soul, and he realized that God had saved him, and was telling him so through his Word.

"This was followed," writes Dr. Bashford, "by a further experience, whether in the body or out of the body I could never tell, and the experience has always seemed too sacred for narration."

A Cry from Heathen Africa

Rev. R. Wodehouse, a missionary at Um-tali, Rhodesia, Africa, writes: "At Beira there are thousands without anyone to tell them of God, and the Portuguese sell the poor natives cheap drinks. We are in immediate need of a colored evangelist here and a small room which could be used as a church. An evangelist could be secured for fifteen dollars a month, and a plain room for a church would cost two hundred dollars. It is an important point. If we can sow the seed, we can send them back to their tribes with the glad tidings of salvation."

A Sign of the Times

Prophetic Significance of a Modern Phenomenon

ONE of the most remarkable events of the last days, as described in the Revelation, is that in which the ten kings "have one mind, and shall give their power and strength to the beast" (Rev. 17:13). This prediction has often been quoted as an instance of the inherent improbability of the Bible prophecies ever being fulfilled. The world has often seen the alliance of two or three powers in an attack on a common enemy, but in those cases each power has had more or less independence, and has conducted its operations on an understanding with its allies, preserving its own identity and separation. It was thought improbable if not impossible that any ten powers would ever consent to place their respective forces at the disposal of any one man.

Yet this identical combination has occurred. The various contingents of the American and European nations, which were sent to the rescue of the Ambassadors who were in peril in Peking, and to the punishment of China and the vindication of foreign diplomatic rights, were by international agreement placed under the command of Count Waldersee, the German General.

A short time ago there was a similar combination, which, however, did not proceed to force, against the Sultan of Turkey. There were regular meetings of the entire diplomatic corps, and their deliberations resulted in mandates which were presented to the Sultan, sometimes in identical notes and at other times by a representative of the corps.

These two experiments show that when the governments have a common object in hand they are capable of uniting to achieve it. They show also that there is a progression in their proceedings in this direction, so that while in Turkey there was an agreement after deliberation and a certain extent of separate action, the next instance of combination had a definite head with the right to control the federated forces.

Prophetic students will note the significance of these events. They show that the governments are becoming familiarized with the idea of combination and united action. Thus the inherent improbability of the prophecy in Revelation is decreased if it does not wholly disappear.

Answers to Prayers

M. P., Price's Forks, Va., writes:

Last autumn, a great financial trouble, which we did not deserve, menaced us, and it seemed we would have to go into the courts. A consecrated friend and myself prayed that we might be delivered, and we have heard no more from it.

Jessie Tracey Benson, President His Willing Circle of King's Daughters and Sons, of Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, writes:

I desire to acknowledge publicly that I have received marvelous answers to prayer this spring. Loved ones restored; many unconverted saved and wonderful strength given me in my mission work. God fulfils his Word when we abide in him. Praise him continually. I am willing my name to be given.

A friend sends in the following requests for prayer of so wide, spiritual and human an interest, that they cannot be omitted here, although this space is set apart for answered prayers rather than requests for prayer: "1. Let all Christian people unite in praying that God may so purify, and guide, and inspire all unattached native and European missionary workers in India and Ceylon, that their work may exist only and more and more for the glory of God's great name. 2. That God may grant a widespread revival among the native and European missionary workers of all regular societies in India and Ceylon. For Christ's sake insert this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

EVER MADE THE TRIP?

While it has always been a beautiful trip over the Lackawanna Railroad to Buffalo, yet the fact has not been so generally known as it has of late, and the result is that the increase of traffic is very large. One of the most talked of pieces of scenery is the Delaware Water Gap, and it would pay any one who has never made the trip to Buffalo by way of the Lackawanna, to take it and view this beautiful spot. Another great advantage is the shortness of the route. It is a fact that the Lackawanna is the shortest road to Buffalo.—Insurance Times.

The Author's Experiences.

U. S. Consul Pike, of Port Louis, Mauritius, has written a charming book upon this gem of the ocean, the home of Paul and Virginia. Col. Pike, whose New York address is 43 Exchange Place, had a curious experience with coffee and the beverage almost destroyed his eyesight.

He says, "Speaking of coffee, my first warning against its use was insomnia followed by depression, and despondency. The nervous system was in such a condition that I could not attend to business, and to my distress I discovered that my eyesight was becoming more and more imperfect every day. From my knowledge of the symptoms of coffee poisoning, I concluded to leave off the coffee and take up Postum Food Coffee in its place. The results were astonishing. Gradually my eyesight recovered, and the nervous condition and depressed feeling disappeared. I have now been using Postum in place of coffee for several years and am in perfect health."

My family of six persons discarded coffee some time ago and use Postum. I would not be without it. It is a most valuable addition to the breakfast table and should be in every household."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The "Hired Girl" Problem*

IT was four weeks after Barbara Clark had been at work as a "hired girl" in the Ward family. She was sitting in her little room at the back of the house, writing a letter to one of her classmates in Mt. Holyoke. She wrote slowly, with many grave pauses and with an anxious look on her face.

"The fact is, Jessie," the letter went on, after several pages, describing a part of the four weeks' experience, "I have come to the conclusion that I am not born to be a reformer. It was all very well when we studied social economics to have our heroic ideals about putting certain theories into practice, but it is quite another thing to do it. I thought when I came here that I might do some great things; but there are no great things about it—just nothing but drudgery, and thankless drudgery at that. And yet Mrs. Ward—but I must not say any more about her. I have stayed over my month as I agreed to do, and to-morrow I am going to let her know that I cannot stay any longer. I think I shall try a place in Bondman's, after all. There is a good deal of the blues in this letter, and, to tell the truth, it is just as I feel. 'A Hired Girl for Four Weeks!' How would it read as title to a magazine article? I might get a few dollars for my experiences if I chose to exploit them. Instead of that, I have given them to you gratis. Shed a tear for me, Jessie, over the grave of my little, useless experiment in practical economics. Your classmate, BARBARA CLARK."

Barbara wearily folded the letter, put it in the envelope, directed it, stamped it; and then, being hardly more than a girl, and a very tired girl, and at the moment one disappointed with herself and all the world, she laid her head down on the little table and cried hard. To tell the truth, it was not the first time that the little table in the little room at the back of the house had seen Barbara's tears since she had come to work at Mrs. Richard Ward's as a "hired girl."

So this was the end of all her heroic enthusiasm for service. It had all turned out in disappointment. To begin with, the weather had been intensely hot all the time. The work was harder in many ways than Barbara had anticipated. Her mother had not been well. One week Mrs. Ward had gone to bed with a succession of nervous headaches. And so on with ceaseless recurrence of the drudgery that grew more and more tiresome. At the end of the month Barbara had summed up everything, and resolutely concluded to leave.

She had not yet gathered courage to tell Mrs. Ward. The woman had been very kind to her in many ways. But she was not well, and there were days when things had occurred that almost sickened Barbara when she recalled them. When she went downstairs the next morning after writing the letter to her former classmate, Barbara had fully made up her mind, not only to give notice of her intention to leave, but to give Mrs. Ward all her reasons why she could not work as a "hired girl" any longer.

†From New York in Fiction, by Arthur Bartlett Maurice. This book is of interest not only to New Yorkers, but to all Americans. It depicts the influence of metropolitan life upon all sections of the country. There are chapters on neglected phases of New York life, "Bohemia," "The Great East Side" and "About the Battery and Broadway." It is profusely and elegantly illustrated. Pp. 231; cloth. tween Seventh and Eighth avenues. It may be noted here, that this house had no tangible original. Mr. Fawcett placed it, for the purpose of the story, in West Twenty-third street, but always felt it to be one of the houses in Fourteenth street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues, "that domain, where the boarding house is ubiquitous." These chapters have an interest far beyond their narrative importance. The boarding-house is, on the whole, more American than Red Gulch or Yuba Bill.

Not but that we have had little touches of this life; it has been a rich field for the joke makers. Mr. John Kendrick Bangs has introduced us to its breakfast-table and pelted us with its harmless, if superfluous, epigrams. But none has treated it seriously in literature or done justice to its vulgarity and its tragic gloom. In the boarding-house scenes of Olivia Delaplaine, passing over the very obvious fact that no woman ever talked as did Mrs. Ottarson, we feel that the Rev. Drowle, the Spillingtons, Bankses, and Sugbys are flagrant caricatures, very degenerate descendants of the Americans of Martin Chuzzlewit. Mrs. Amelia Sugby, purveyor of the literature in which chambermaids and factory heroines delight, is a type that has been so persistently flaunted, that it has ceased even to bore.

Boarding-house life, vulgar as it is, is too great and too vitally American to be treated merely in caricature. We have seen somewhat inadequately its laughable pretence, its amusing vanity, its sham elegance. But the man who treats its shabby gentility seriously, who can grasp its power, its intrigue, its passion, its pathos, will come very near to giving us the great American novel.

Gospel Work in Dakota

IT is but a month ago that the Rescue Mission of Sioux Falls, So. Dakota, was one year old. From small beginnings the work has steadily grown, until to-day the Mission occupies a neat two-story building on East Tenth street. Sioux Falls being a railroad centre of no small importance, the Mission is in a position to "throw out the life-line" to a class of men that otherwise it would be impossible to reach. No case is considered too desperate to be helped, and everything is done to aid ex-convicts, inebriates and fallen women to lead a better life. Temporary homes are provided for the penitent until employment can be found. A good supply of clothing, underwear and shoes is always kept on hand in order that temporal necessities may be met until the wanderer is able to purchase clothing. Superintendent Birch and wife are most earnest Christian workers of broad experience; until recently they were engaged in rescue work in a large city in Iowa.

The personal work of the Mission, which is carried on wholly by voluntary contributions, could be greatly extended if more funds were available.

A Poet's Tribute

Dear HERALD, thy tidings are welcome
To many a waiting fireside.
We may not note all thy wanderings,
For the world is needful and wide;
But we know 'tis over the mountains
And away on the ocean tide.

To the homes of the worn and weary
Thou bearest sweet promise of light,
And many are waiting thine advent
Who only see Time in its night.
Blest be thy mission, dear HERALD,
And far be continued thy flight!

To fields of Cathay, to the Indies,
To the home-slums, long may you bear
The Word thou hast set on thy banner
And the spirit of helpful prayer,
So that when the Ledger is opened
We may read of thy good deeds there.

THE NOVEL TWO SEASON CHURCH AT PARKERSBURG, W. VA.

A SUMMER AND WINTER CHURCH

HOW to make church going more popular and attractive has been one of the studies of Rev. Orilas G. White, minister of the St. Mary's Avenue Christian Church at Parkersburg, W. Va.

There result of his cogitations led him to the conclusion that the design of the edifice itself might make it more desirable as a meeting place, and that it could be built to afford more comfort, especially in the hot summer. Mr. White decided to plan a structure which, upon examination by prominent members of the congregation, met their hearty approval. It is undoubtedly the only building of its kind yet completed in the United States for religious services. The lower portion is severely plain in appearance, having none of the ornamentation so frequently seen in sacred edifices. It has entrances on two sides, which lead straight into what might be called the winter auditorium. In keeping with the exterior, the decorations of this apartment are exceedingly simple in character. Two broad staircases lead from the lower auditorium to what people in Parkersburg call the "roof garden," but which in reality is a summer auditorium. Closed on two sides by brick walls, the windows can be opened like doors, and they are so large that the space inside gives ample ventilation. During the warm weather services are conducted above, the windows being thrown open to allow the air and sunshine to reach all portions of the apartment. The roof is also provided with large skylights, which can be thrown open at will. Both the lower and upper floors are large enough to seat six hundred people, and are supplied with plain but substantial pews and pulpit furniture. An organ, large enough to fill the musical requirements, has been procured, which is moved from the lower to the upper auditorium as the seasons change. Rev. Mr. White has increased the congregation of St. Mary's from less than one hundred to over five hundred persons within two years. He is a graduate of the West Virginia University, and has become noted in his section of the country for his progressiveness in religious matters.

mission station was besieged. For five weeks Messrs. Kay and McKie, the only white men in the station, alternately kept guard over the other inmates, Mrs. Kay and her child, Miss Chapman, and Miss Way, two Australian ladies brought in from an out-station at Ichang. The local mandarin finally told them to save themselves, and after anxious counsel together, it was decided to divide into two little parties, and endeavor to escape to the mountains.

CHINA'S WOE

HEED, oh! heed, poor China's call,
Bands of Christians, one and all.
Let revenge dull not the light
Of the star of heaven so bright.
That above the manger shone
On the night The Christ was born.

Famine stalks in that far land;
Death, with sickle keen, doth stand,
And he mows the young and old,
With his ruthless hand so bold.
God has blessed our own good land;
Shall we stay the helping hand?

'Tis our brother that doth call.
Hasten, Christians! one and all.
If we see our brother need,
And refuse his grief to heed,
How in us can God's light dwell?
His commands we know too well.

Saved by Chinese Christians

AT this time, when the missionaries are pleading for the perishing people of Shansi, in China, the story of the narrow escape from death of two devoted missionaries, who were saved from the rebellious Boxers through the fidelity of Christian natives, is singularly timely. Rev. Graham McKie, and Miss Manon Chapman were both mission workers in the Shansi field, with headquarters at Kuhwu. In May of last year the Boxers occupied the place, and the

On July 4, Mr. McKie, dressed in Chinese fashion, accompanied by the young women, also disguised as Chinese men, squeezed through the city gates just as they were being shut for the night. They reached the house of a native convert, five miles away. Mr. and Mrs. Kay endeavored to follow the next day, but they and their child were detected, and brutally murdered. Whilst Mr. McKie and his companions were in hiding, the place was searched by Boxers, and on the advice of their faithful Chinese boy, Yuen, they decided to trust themselves to a notorious hill robber, who guaranteed to keep them safe for two months. For several weeks they had a terrible life, living in caves and gulleys, exposed to the weather, and generally half starved. Through it all Yuen stuck to them, facing death and capture a dozen times to obtain food for the party. Separated from their escort for a few days, they, the missionaries, were captured by a mob of villagers brandishing weapons and shouting, "Kill the foreign devils." When all seemed lost, Mr. McKie produced an old passport, and harangued the crowd so successfully that they not only released him and his friends, but provided them with food. Yuen finally took them to his home, near Kingchai, where Governor Sih found them, and brought them to Ping-Yan-Fu under protection, after eight months' hardship.

FAMILY FOOD.

Crisp, Toothsome and Requires No Cooking.

A little boy down in N. C. asked his mother to write an account of how Grape-Nuts Food had helped their family.

She says Grape-Nuts was first brought to her attention on a visit to Charlotte, where she visited the Mayor of that city who was using the Food by the advice of his physician. She says, "They derive so much good from it that they never pass a day without using it. While I was there I used the Food regularly. I gained about 15 pounds and felt so well that when I returned home I began using Grape-Nuts in the family regularly.

My little 18 months old baby shortly after being weaned was very ill with dyspepsia and teething. She was sick nine weeks and we tried everything. She became so emaciated that it was painful to handle her and we thought we were going to lose her. One day a happy thought urged me to try Grape-Nuts soaked in a little warm milk.

Well it worked like a charm and she began taking it regularly and improvement set in at once. She is now getting well and round and fat as fast as possible and on Grape-Nuts.

Sometime ago a number of the family were stricken with LaGrippe at the same time, and during the worst stages we could not relish anything in the shape of food but Grape-Nuts and oranges, everything else nauseated us.

We all appreciate what your famous food has done for our family."

THE NEW CREATION

The Principle of the Material Creation Applied to the Soul

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

VERY soul of man which is brought into contact with God is dealt with as he has dealt with the creation. We, too, were created not to be a waste, but to be inhabited, indwelt by God himself. But, oh! when the Spirit of God moves upon us, and the Word of God says, "Let there be light," what do we see in ourselves of ruin and of emptiness! When our eyes are opened to see "the Man," oh! how distorted, how hideous do we see ourselves! And yet the Master-Workman comes into the dire confusion, and we learn that we, even we are "his workmanship" (Eph. 2: 10). The Master-Workman did not annihilate the world which God created, but he formed it anew. He brought light where there had been darkness; division and order where all had been confusion; fertility and life where all had been a waste. He divided the light from the darkness, day from night; the waters, by a firmament to be above and beneath it; the dry land from the sea. Every day of his creative work began in night—it was always "the evening and the morning," not the morning and the evening. He works in the darkness, and his work is seen in the light. Shall we not trust him in the dark? "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts 15: 18). His plan is formed; but to enter into it we must learn to trust him. He has undertaken to perfect that which concerneth his workmanship.

There was a wonderful order in God's creation; everything he made was a preparation for what should follow. He created light; no plant could live without it. The waters, the dry land, all must be ready for the first forms of life in the vegetable creation; the thick darkness must give way, so that the "warm sun could shine forth to ripen the grain and the fruits. Then the waters themselves must bring forth the life which should exist in them, and in the firmament already prepared; the beast must be brought forth from the earth made ready for it, and plant and herb, sea and sky, sun and water, must minister to the animal creation. But the masterpiece of the Master-Workman must yet be made; and the holy Trinity held, as it were, a council over this crowning work. "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them have dominion." All else must be subordinate and minister to man; he alone should rule who must exist to minister to God.

And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them. And God blessed them; and God said unto them, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." The dominion of the heavens or firmament was not delivered over to man; and his dominion of earth has been disputed by the prince of this world. The enemy's object has been, ever since the creation, to make man a slave to the earth instead of being its master, and terribly has he succeeded. As there was this gradation in God's creation; everything created to serve, and each in its own order to serve what should follow it; and man was created to have dominion over all, how should man also serve? He was but a deputed king, under authority; he was to rule for him who deputed him; and it was his glory to serve him who had made him in his own image, after his likeness.

In his workmanship of creating us anew, our beloved Lord follows the same line as he took in the creation. He gives light before all else, and as a necessary preparation for all else. Alas! too often we have mistaken light for life, and have imagined ourselves much more advanced in the development of Christ formed in us (Gal. 4: 19) than we really were. But as the light becomes more distinct, and the sun, moon, and stars divide in our experience the "signs" and "seasons," "days and years" (Gen. 1: 14), we are again in danger of seeing how very short we come, and of doubting whether the work of the great Master-Workman is making any progress at all. It was only when light first came in the creation days that the emptiness and disorder could be seen. It was only when the dry land appeared that the barrenness of earth could be discerned; it was only when fish and fowl, beast and cattle began to multiply, that no king of this fair dominion could be found, and no creature which could exercise authority. Thus it is in our experience. And yet every work of God prepares for what shall follow. He has his plan, and "his work is perfect" (Deut. 32: 4).

There was no flaw in God's creation: God saw everything that he had made, "and behold, it was very good" (Gen. 1: 31). When the Lord Jesus shall have seen of the travail of his soul for his Church, and shall be fully satisfied: when he presents to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but wholly and without blemish (Eph. 5: 27), then God shall say again, "It is very good." And when, in the Millennium, his ancient people Israel shall be "all righteous," and shall fulfil their destiny to be a blessing to all the nations of the earth, God will say, "It is very good." And when, after the judgment of Satan, and of those who shall join his standard at the end of the Millennium (Rev. 20: 7-10), and who, being still rebellious, have forced the hand of God to cast them into "the lake of fire" prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25: 41); he shall create the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness (II. Peter 3: 13); when sin, sorrow, pain, death are no more, then again he shall say, "It is very good."

"And the heaven and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God finished his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made."

Nebraska Heard From

IN a contributed article from a home missionary, which appeared in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the statement was made that in certain counties in Nebraska and Dakota there were sections where, in some homes at least, "the name of Jesus is unknown, save as an expression of profanity." This statement, which we characterized at the time as a remarkable one, has brought forth a number of letters from Western readers, in protest. As it is the invariable custom of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to present both sides of a question, we give below extracts from some of these letters. Mr. F. H. Mossman writes:

I have lived in northwest Nebraska, and southwest Dakota for fifteen years; was born, and grew up in the West, and have never yet, to my knowledge, seen a white man, woman, or child, ten years or over, "In whose home the name of Jesus Christ is unknown, save as an expression of profanity." Neither have I ever known any above the age mentioned who has not some knowledge of the Bible, and many are thorough Bible students. Mr. S., in his letter, speaks of Holt, Rock, Brown, and Cherry counties, Nebraska, as being "exceedingly large counties," and states that there are but "three resident ministers" in them. The counties named have a total population of 25,044. In this territory the M. E. Church makes the following showing: Active ministers, 22; church members, 1,343; Sunday Schools, 29; officers and teachers in these schools, 260; scholars, not including officers and teachers, 1,484. I am informed that the following church societies are also represented: Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, United Brethren, Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Lutheran, and Catholic. There are probably some others; also, numerous missionaries, sent out by different societies over this territory each year. All of these organizations are working in the same noble cause with Mr. S. and his brother missionaries, not to Christianize a half civilized race, but to strengthen God's kingdom among an intelligent American people. I enclose herewith a photo, which shows a fair sample residence occupied by a small ranchman. This place is situated in Dawes county, but all of these northwest counties of Nebraska are about alike.

Mr. R. H. Pollock, Nebraska State Sunday School Association, Lincoln, Nebraska, writes:

There are more than one dozen ministers of various denominations in Holt county, at least two in Rock county, eight in Brown county, and several in Cherry county, all of my acquaintance; yet, your correspondent states there are but three resident ministers in those four counties. There has been one resident Sunday School missionary in Holt county for fifteen years, and that whole territory has been canvassed over and over again by Sunday School missionaries of several denominations, and Holt county reports to my office thirty-five Sunday Schools, and the other counties report from eight to twenty each.

Letters on the same subject have also been received from Harolds, Grimes, Chambers, Neb., and T. A. Moss, Atkinson, Neb. The Ainsworth (Neb.) Star Journal publishes a letter from Mr. Wm. B. Ely, in which he takes issue with the writer of the original letter, making it clear that the latter wrote without sufficient inquiry and acquaintance with the actual conditions prevailing in the counties he described in his letter.

Religion and Patriotism*

he Power of Christian Influence in Promoting National Righteousness

WHEN we read that "The powers that be are ordained of God; whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," we naturally ask ourselves what must be the position of Cromwell and Washington and other venerated men, who took their lives in their hands and resisted "the powers," that they might deliver their country. Paul appears to have conceived of the Church as people whose citizenship was in heaven, who had higher concerns than those of politics, and whose best course was to hold aloof from mundane concerns, so living as to set a good example of industry and purity of life, without meddling with questions of citizenship. He appeared to think that an interest in social or political matters might divert the attention from the great concerns of the Christian life, and, like King a wife, might embarrass him who wished to devote himself wholly to the service of Christ. In all matters of honor and morality, the Christian must be obedient to the law. If he were a true Christian he would not wish to do otherwise. The law was established to punish murderers, thieves and other wrongdoers. Therefore the Christian was not likely to incur its penalties. Let him obey the law wherever he might be, and take his part in movements which, after all, were mere matters of worldly concern, unimportant to one who was hourly expecting the return of Christ to establish his kingdom which should never be moved. The wisdom of such a course was obvious. The government under which he lived was a pure despotism, a system which would have been hopeless and suicidal. As Paul advised his converts to abide in the same calling wherein he was called, so let them obey the government which in the providence of God was established in the land where they might happen to be.

In later times, however, very different conditions of life came into existence. There were struggles in which it would have been shameful and cowardly for the Christian to have taken no part. When the forces of cruelty and injustice and wickedness were arrayed against the forces of right and liberty, the Christian would have been false to his principles if he had not contributed his strength to the cause of justice and truth. When the weak and the oppressed needed a champion, where was one so likely to be found among those who had been delivered by the self-sacrifice and death of Christ? When the powers that be interfere with a man's faith and conscience and religious liberty, and men are making a brave stand for religious freedom, the Christian should bethere to help in the struggle. When the powers that be in a great city of our time are shamelessly disgracing the city by protecting and encouraging wrongdoers and an attempt is being made to defile the city and remove temptations from its streets, on whose assistance have its leaders more reason to count than on those who have been taught to hate sin and love righteousness? Law and order and of divine ordination it is true; but it would strain our credulity to believe that in some cases the men who administer the laws have been ordained of God to that work. To oppose them, to remove them from office if possible, to strive by all means to replace them by men of good principle is a Christian's duty. Disasters indeed would it be if every Christian withdrew from office and refrained from exercising his right to vote. The mere withdrawal, the struggle for the spoils of office, the virtuous resistance to duly constituted authority are matters in which the Christian can take no part; but when he avails himself of his rights as a citizen to aid the forces which make for righteousness in a community, he is consistent with the principles of his faith and is doing a patriotic duty. If he holds himself aloof he indirectly aids the enemies of God and incurs their reproach addressed to the men of Moab who "came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

It is doubtful whether the Church has done all for the welfare of our beloved land that it might have done. That it has done much there can be no question. The consciousness that an outrage on the principles of religion would be visited by the condemnation of the Christian community has doubtless kept unscrupulous men from mischievous legislation and from making improper nominations, but more than this might have been done. The primary and the political convention have been left in many sections almost entirely to the management of professional politicians, who have had no regard for righteousness. In some instances the Christians of the community have shrunk from uncongenial associations; in others they have despaired of doing any good. Even when an effort has been made to purify the political conditions, the leaders have received only a languid and half-hearted support from the Churches. The reason cannot be that the Christian does not love his country, nor that he is indifferent to the issue of the struggle between wickedness and righteousness in high places. It has probably been largely due to a lack of organization and to a conviction of the hopelessness of individual effort. It may be that the present movement for the federation of the Churches will remove these difficulties. It is surely a hopeful augury that such a movement has been commenced. Perhaps the time may come when every Christian throughout the land, no matter what his denominational affiliation, shall regard himself as one member of a mighty army, whose representatives will have the power to utter a protest against unrighteousness in national, State and municipal government, with an influence that must be heeded, because it will have the loyal support of every man who bears the Christian name. May God speed that time!

THE FAR COUNTRY

IN the far, far country, weary, wand'ring one,
There are shares and pitfalls you can never shun—
Only husks to feed you, only woe and blight,
Only dreary deserts and the gloom of night.

In the far, far country have you lost your all;
Where the wine may sparkle, but it turns to gall?
Oh! there's bitter sorrow if you still will roam
In the far, far country; Oh! come home! come home!

In the far, far country, think of home and love!
Think of father, mother, and the Friend above,
Leave that sin-cursed country, let your wand'ring cease,
There is welcome waiting, there is pardon, peace.

REFRAIN:

In the far, far country,
Far from home, far from God,
In the famine country
You have sadly trod;
Turn away, repent to-day,
Let your feet no longer roam;
In the far, far country no longer stay,
Repent! Come home! come home!

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions Will be Answered July 31

1. An aged friend, long past the "allotted span," asks: "Is it selfish to desire heaven?" Is his contemplation of the joys of heaven tinged with selfishness? What is the answer?
2. If a hive of bees swarm on Sunday, would the bee-keeper be justified in having them as a work of necessity, or should he let them go, knowing that by so doing he will lose them?
3. What is the greatest defect in child-training to-day?
4. What great reformer died saying he was weary of the world?
5. Is a minister justified in accepting a call at a larger salary, if he is in no special need of the increase, when he knows that he is doing valuable work in his present field, and that it might be difficult to fill his place with a successor?

1. If a person should make a vow and be convinced afterward that he ought not to have made it, would he be justified in breaking it?

One should be careful never to make a rash promise or rash vow, and never should either be lightly broken; yet there may be instances in which to break them is the less of two evils. Who can doubt that Herod might better have broken his oath than have ordered the execution of the noble Baptist? For might he not as well be a perjurer as a murderer? Jephthah also ought to have broken his vow (Judges 11: 34-40) to offer his daughter in sacrifice. It would have been better than to do a thing so horrible. That vows are not absolutely binding in every case, is proven by the fact that the Levitical law given by God himself provided for release from them in certain cases. God is merciful and forgives even the broken vow, if broken only from sincere desire to do what seems most nearly right.

AMELIA HOYT.

"It is better not to vow than to vow and not to pay." That is the wholesome, divine law. Any general departure from that law would issue in loss of character, and loss of faith between man and man. "He sweareth to his own heart, and changeth not," that is one characteristic of the man who "shall never be moved." We have to be specially careful not to go back on a vow if the keeping of it merely hurts ourselves. If the hurt of another is involved, the case is different. Herod, for instance, vowed to give to Salome whatsoever she would ask. The keeping of that vow, on a mistaken point of honor, involved Herod in a monstrous crime. Such a vow, so uncertain in its application, ought not to have been made; but when it became apparent what a wicked issue was involved in it, that vow ought to have been broken. The safe and right way to avoid such complications and uncertainties is to be very sure that what we vow is right, and then rigorously stand to it.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

2. Does sound exist, outside and independent of the delicate mechanism of the ear, or is all nature silent and is sound produced only by the impact of the air waves upon the auditory nerve?

The word "sound" really has two meanings; the subjective (which has reference to our mind), and the objective (which refers to objects around us). 1. If by sound, we mean a sensation produced on organs of hearing, then, of course, where there is no ear there can be no sound. Niagara, poured over its precipice for ages, but fell in silence. "It was only," to quote Professor Steele, "when first some ear felt the pulsations of the torrent that the cataract found a voice." 2. If by sound, we mean vibrations of matter capable of producing the sensation of hearing, then, indeed, we may

Such a man will barter imperishable principles for coins which rust. The farthest point to which a man can go in this direction is when his heart hardens into a lump of gold, and the worshipper becomes of the same nature as his idol. Sin stamps its image on the character, and that character becomes not only a sinner, but sin itself, the very essence of that which makes a sinner. Wealth becomes his master under following conditions: 1. When he gives business all his time. The man who absorbs all his time for selfish purposes robs God of eternity, for when a person gives his time to God's service God will give him eternity as interest, but when we waste time we throw away eternity. Such a person when at home is in his office, when in church is in the world, and even his dream is an airy exchange. 2.

4. Is there any benefit derived from the oath if it is administered to jurymen and witnesses in a court of justice, or to office-holders entering on their duties? Will either the good or the bad man do his duty more fully because he has taken the oath?

Doubtless there are many men of fixed principles that putting them upon oath does not increase their faithfulness; there may be men so devoid of principle even the taking of an oath arouses no feelings. Still, whatever quickens one's sense of God tends to increase the sense of responsibility. This the taking of an oath may solemnly remind one that what he is about to say or do is not unto man merely, but unto God. Moreover, an oath is the highest form of confirmation and as such, on many occasions, satisfies a natural demand (Heb. 6: 16). When God himself regarded his human requirement when he confirmed his promise to Abraham with an oath (Heb. 6: 13). Other passages of scripture illustrate and sanctify its use. W. A. FINN.

5. Is vivisection ever justifiable? That is, can be right to torture a living animal in order to show a class of medical students the operation of the muscles, etc., when the same cannot be shown on a dead animal?

Torture is unjust—injustice is never justifiable; therefore, the torture of beasts in vivisection is never justifiable. The operation of the muscles consists of contraction and relaxation. This can be shown by means of electricity on a dead animal—no more, to "operation of the muscles," can be shown on a living animal, so far as normal action is concerned. In abnormal conditions, such as the injection of a drug, the element of torture would enter the result of the experiment untrustworthy, because it would be impossible to distinguish between the effect of the drug and that of the torture inflicted in the preliminary preparation of the beast in other ways.

truly say that even where there is no ear there can still be sound. It is in this latter sense that the word is commonly used by scientists.

A. H.

It is rather a metaphysical refinement to say that there is no sound in all nature until there is an ear. It is based upon the physical fact that it takes the ear and auditory nerve to translate motion in the air into sound, as the mind perceives it, and is delighted or pained by it. It does take an ear to make sound out of these vibrations in any such quality as the mind can receive. Yet all nature is full of motion, and all the external elements of sound, whether there be any ear to hear or not. If every ear was deaf, all nature would still be vibrant, and the harmony of the whole, culminating in the music of the spheres, would go on as truly as to-day. The tremendous thunderclap, which rends the stoutest oak in the remote uninhabited forest, produces the same shock in all the air around it as we have heard with terror on a June morning.

3. At what point and under what conditions in a successful business career might it be said of a man that he no longer controlled his wealth, but that the money was master of the man?

When he reaches the point of putting policy before principle he is a slave, not a master.

When he gives his business all his love. When the golden calf is in the heart there is no room in it for the Lamb of God.

R. T. EDWARDS.

A man is no longer master of his wealth when he suppresses his scruples as to questionable means of acquiring and keeping money; when his pleasure consists almost solely in the making of money, and when his mind is constantly wandering from all other topics and occupations to that; when he has come to believe that money is wealth, forgetting that it is only the representative of wealth, and that there are many things in the world that it cannot buy; when he forgets that he is only a steward of God's means and not the possessor of anything in his own right; when he sees nothing pleasant and sweet in social life, and can neither entertain nor be entertained in society; when the study of his bank-book gives him more pleasure than that of any branch of knowledge or any of the beauties of nature, and when the ardor, enthusiasm and noble aspirations of youth are replaced by the cold, distant and unsympathetic nature that now dominates him. He is no longer master of his wealth when it grieves him to part with it for the relief of poverty or suffering, when only shame or the desire to be thought well of in society induces him to give.

L. T. RIGHTSELL.

Perhaps not from the animal's standpoint, but the human being has the say in this case. I would say that it is justifiable in every case in which the surgeon has good reason to believe that he can learn from vivisection a new way how to mitigate some form of human suffering and save human life, so that he uses chloroform or ether, or some anesthetic, to prevent the animal suffering more than is necessary. It is never justifiable to practice vivisection simply to demonstrate to a class of students facts already ascertained, which the student ought to ascertain by testimony.

Miscellaneous Questions

- I. F. M., Brooklyn. What islands are under the rule of the United States?

The Philippines, Guam, and Wake and the Ladrone Archipelago, Tutuila of the Samoan group, and Hawaii belong to us in the West; Porto Rico, and various small islands and our coast.

Margaret, Midway, Va. 1. When were the American series of postage stamps issued by the Government? 2. How many, and what are the designs that comprise the set?

1. May 1. 2. Six; the character of the designs, which are fine steel engravings, justify the term, "Aids to Commerce," which has been applied to the set. The one-cent stamp represents "Fast Lake Navigation." The two-cent stamp is a picture of the New York Central's "Empire State Express," when the train was running sixty-four miles an hour—a very appropriate "aid to commerce." The four-cent stamp represents an automobile. The five-cent stamp gives a beautiful picture of the steel arch bridge over the Niagara River at Niagara Falls. The eight-cent stamp shows the locks at Ste. Marie. The ten-cent stamp gives a illustration of a modern ocean steamship.

MRS. SPEAKER HENDERSON

THE LADIES OF THE WHITE-HOUSE

HERE is a small circle of ladies in official life at the National Capital, who have special social privileges and prerogatives which fairly entitle them to be known as "The Ladies of the White House." There are twelve, or at most, fifteen, of these favored ones. They are the wives and daughters of a Cabinet Minister two, of Senators, Representatives and Justices of the Supreme Court. Among the matrons are Mrs. Justice McKenna, Mrs. Representative Hitt, Mrs. Senator Scott, Mrs. Senator Fairbanks, Mrs. Senator Foraker, Mrs. Senator Turner, Mrs. Representative Olmsted, Mrs. Speaker Henderson, Mrs. Senator Hansbrough, and Mrs. John Logan. The younger element includes Miss Hildegard, daughter of Justice McKenna; Miss Fannie Fuller, daughter of the Chief Justice; Miss Oggs, daughter of the Attorney General; the Misses France and Julia, daughters of Senator Foraker, and the Misses Ruth and Mabel Hanna.

Any of these ladies are to be set down as the close friends of the hostess of the White House, or at least closer than others, the choice would probably lie between Mrs. Senator Fairbanks and the Hanna girls. I cannot be fairly said, however, that Mrs. McKinley has any favorites. Indeed, it may be said that a without exception, were equally devoted to the White House invalid after her return from her arduous Western journey. When it was thought the sands of her life were ebbing, they were constantly within call.

All the ladies name-catchers and misses, one and go at all hours at the White House, helping Mrs. McKinley in her social duties, assisting in advising in every way, according to the needs of the wife of the President. If there is to be a dinner for the diplomats or members of the Cabinet, some one among the matrons is always to help with the arrangements. If there is to be an informal gathering for the younger element, then one of the younger ladies is called upon to assume some share of responsibility for the success of the occasion. Mrs. McKinley sometimes accepts the invitation of one of these ladies for a drive.

One of Mrs. McKinley's most pleasing characteristics, as described by one of her closest friends, is her perfect sincerity and thoughtfulness for others. No day passes in which she does not do some good for some one. Her friends, who run in to pay her a morning call, or to have tea with her in the afternoon, are frequently compelled to withhold information of the afflictions of others from their sensitive hostess, because of the latter's liability to worry and thus imperil her own very delicate health. Mrs. McKinley, however, never complains of her own health, even to the ladies who are admitted to the inner chambers of the Executive Mansion.

One of those intimate friends tells how Mrs. McKinley has, with her own hands, earned considerable sums of money, or its equivalent, for charitable or benevolent purposes. Not so very long ago, she knitted three thousand five hundred pairs of woolen slippers, for invalids and institutions or charities.

"Think of the time and patience required to make so many pairs of slippers," said the friend who told of the incident. "Well, she is always knitting, or embroidering, or doing something with her hands—and always making something that will be of use to others."

Mrs. McKinley's thoughtfulness for others is very marked. She is most solicitous concerning the welfare of all who are around her and whom she meets as the hostess of the White House. When sorrow comes, or affliction of any kind, she never fails to send flowers, and kind, cheering messages to the suffering ones. She is especially interested in her friend's children. The loss of her own children, years ago, has been to her a source of great grief. She likes to have the little ones come to see her at the White House, and then she chats lovingly of what might have been, if her own children had lived.

illness. They know her affectionate, sensitive nature, and they know how thoroughly devoted she has always been—even from girlhood—to church and charitable work. She has never allowed the dignity of her position or the demands of official society to interfere with this work. A writer, who knows her well, has furnished THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this pleasing sketch of "the First Lady in the Land":

Always at the head of every movement for the advancement of religious work, she often led the work in person. She was all that a Christian wife and mother should be, and commanded the respect, almost the worship, of the other members of the congregation of the Metropolitan M. E. Church. When ill-health and all its self-denial came along, she sorrowfully gave up her work to a certain extent. The doctors said she must have absolute rest and quiet, and Mrs. McKinley reluctantly obeyed their commands. But very often, as she lay in bed at home, her mind was busy with new plans for helping her beloved church, or some new way to aid the poor of the town. Washington is full of stories of good deeds done by the "Lady of the White House," and her charity has become well-nigh proverbial. She is constantly giving, sometimes money, sometimes clothing, according to what the applicant needs.

During her latest sickness, and when life seemed to hang by a thread, there were hundreds in Washington who recalled, with kindly and sympathetic feeling, the gentle, generous acts that had come within their own knowledge, and which demonstrated the goodness of that heart which dwelt in such a feeble body. In the Ladies' Aid Society of the Metropolitan Church, she was always one of the most interested helpers. Each Sunday she sent to the church altar flowers from the White House greenhouses, which she had personally picked, and she always had them sent to some poor invalid, to brighten a sick-room, after church service was over. The finest blooms in her conservatories she culled and sent to the sick and the hospitals, sending with them some appetizing dainty from her own kitchen. Every day brought her notes from the thankful and delighted receivers of those pleasing attentions. She told the wife of a Senator that she had knitted with her own fingers 3,000 yarn slippers, every pair of which had been given outright to the poor. She has given from her own personal purse, times without number, to a multitude of good causes. Whenever any charitable fund is started in Washington, the promoters reckon upon her as an unfailing contributor.

Mrs. Speaker Henderson is an ever cheerful companion, domestic in her habits. She often helps Mrs. McKinley with her charitable work.

Of the younger set, Miss Fuller, Miss Griggs, and Miss Foraker, are the leaders, and of the ablest assistance to Mrs. McKinley on occasions when the youth of official life in Washington is invited to the White House.

To those who know Mrs. McKinley best, it is not surprising that the sympathy of the entire country should have been so deeply stirred during her recent

Wholesome Indignation

TEXT: Ephesians 4: 26:
BE YE ANGRY, AND SIN NOT

IQUIPOISE of temper, kindness, patience, forbearance, are extolled by most of the radiant pens of inspiration, but my text contains that which at first sight is startling. A certain kind of anger is approved, ay, we are commanded to indulge in it. The most of us have no need to cultivate high temper, and how often we say things and do things under affronted impulse which we are sorry for when, perhaps, it is too late to make effective apology! Why then should the apostle Paul dip his pen in the ink horn and trace upon parchment, afterwards to be printed upon paper for all ages, the injunction, "Be ye angry, and sin not?"

My text commends a wholesome indignation. It discriminates between the offense and the offender, the sin and the sinner, the crime and the criminal.

To illustrate: Alcoholism has ruined more fortunes, blasted more homes, destroyed more souls than any evil that I think of. It pours a river of poison and fire through the nations. Millions have died because of it, and millions are dying now, and others will die. Intemperance is an old sin. The great Cyrus, writing to the Lacedemonians of himself, boasted of many of his qualities, among others, that he could drink and bear more wine than his distinguished brother. Louis X. and Alexander the Great died drunk. The Parliament of Edinburgh in 1661 is called in history "The drunken Parliament." Hugh Miller, first stonemason and afterwards a world-renowned geologist, writes of the drinking habits of his day, saying: "When the foundation was laid, they drank; when the walls were leveled for laying the joists, they drank; when the building was finished, they drank; when an apprentice joined, they drank." In the eighteenth century, the giver of an entertainment boasted that none of the guests went away sober. Noah, the first ship captain, was wrecked—not in the ark, for that was safely landed—but he was wrecked with strong drink. Every man or woman rightly constructed will blush with indignation at the national and international and hemispheric and planetary curse. It is good to be aroused against it. You come out of that condition a better man or a better woman. Be ye angry at that abomination; and the more anger the more exaltation to character. But that aroused feeling becomes sinful when it extends to the victim of this great evil. Drunkenness you are to hate with a vivid hatred; but the drunkard you are to pity, to help to extricate.

Extenuating Circumstances

Just take into consideration that there are men and women who once were as upright as yourself, who have been prostrated by alcoholism. Perhaps it came of a physician's prescription for the relief of pain, a recurrence of the pain calling for a continuance of the remedy: perhaps the grandfather was an inebriate, and the temptation to inebriety, leaping over a generation, has swooped on this unfortunate; perhaps it was under an attempt to drown trouble that the benumbing and narcotic liquid was sought after; perhaps it was a very gradual chaining of the man with the beverage which was thought to be a servant, when one day it announced itself master. Be humble now, and admit that there is a strong probability that, under the same circumstances, you yourself might have been captured. The two appropriate emotions for you to allow are indignation at the intoxicant which enthralled, and sympathy for the victim. Try to get the sufferer out of his present environment; recommend any hygienic relief that you know of, and above all, implore the divine rescue for the struggle in which so many of the noblest and grandest have been worsted. Do not give yourself up to too many philippics about what the man ought to have been, and ought to have done. While your cheek flushes with wrath at the foe that has brought the ruin, let your eye be moistened with tears of pity for the sufferer. In that way you will have fulfilled the injunction of the text, "Be ye angry, and sin not."

There is another evil, the abhorrence of which you are all called to, and it is on the increase—the gambling practice. Recent developments show that much of this devastation is being wrought in ladies' parlors. It is an evil which sometimes is as polite and gracious as it is harmful. Indeed, there never were so many people trying to get money without earning it. But it is a haggard transgression that comes down to us from the past, blighting all its way.

I have seen in the archives of the nation in this national capital, a large book, in which one of the early Presidents of the United States kept an account in his own handwriting of gains and losses at playing cards, on one page the gains, and on the other the losses, and there are many pages. In other days, many of national reputation went from the halls of Congress and the Senate chamber to spend the night in notorious gambling saloons. One of the ablest men of the centuries, Charles Fox, got ready for his speech against "The Petition of the Clergy" by spending twenty-two hours at the gaming table. Irving's life of Oliver Goldsmith says that the great poet lost thirty pounds, all his earnings, in a short tour to see the world. Gibbon, the author of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire came to his own decline and fall through gaming practices, and in a letter in 1776, said, "I have undone myself, and it is to no purpose to conceal from you my abominable madness and folly. I have never lost so much in five days as I have to-night, and I am in debt to the house for the whole."

The Gambling Curse

In Spain, a Don lost in twenty-four hours what equals twelve million dollars. Twenty years ago it was estimated that the average gambling exchange of money throughout Christendom exceeded one hundred and twenty-three billion, one hundred million dollars a year; but statistics twenty years ago would be tame compared with the present statistics, if we could find any one able enough at figures to tabulate them. It is all the same spirit of gambling, whether the instruments are cards, or the clicking chips, or the turning wheel, or the bids of the Stock Exchange, where people sell what they never owned, and fail because they cannot get paid for it. A prominent banker tells me that he thinks fifty thousand people were financially prostrated by the recent insanities in Wall street. Here and there a case is reported, but the vast majority suffer in silence. The children are brought home from school; the wardrobe will be denied replenishment; the table will have scant supply; wild generosity will be turned into grim want. Forty years from now will be felt the disaster of last month's black Thursday.

Can you hear the story of the unprincipled manipulators of stocks, and of the devices of the gambling saloon to entrap the verdant and unsuspecting without having your pulses tingle, and your heart thump, and your entire nature shocked with the villainy? If so, you are not much of a man or much of a woman. You ought to be angry, for there is no sin in such vehement dislike. You ought to be so angry that you could not repress your feelings in the presence of young men who are just forming their life-theories. In every possible way you ought to denounce such stupendous robbery. Let it be known that the only successful game in which a man plays for money is the one in which he loses all, and stops.

But while you are hotly indignant against the crime, how do you feel about those who were fleeced and slain? They did not know that their small boat was so near the maelstrom. Some of them were born with a tendency to recklessness, and experiment, and hazard. They inherited a disposition to tempt chance. Do not heap on them additional discouragements; do not deride their losses. Help them to start again. Show them that there are more fortunes yet to be gained than have yet been gathered, and that with God for their friend they will be provided for here, and through the Saviour's mercy they may reign forever in the land where there are no losses, and infinite gains. While you may reden in the face at the fact that gambling is the disgraceful mother of multitudinous crimes, of envies, jealousies, revenges, quarrels, cruelties, falsehoods, forgeries, suicides, murders and despair, of the victim of the vice, and what you do. He needs more sympathy than the man who came up from inebriety, and debauch, and assassination, for many such repent, and are saved, but confirmed gamblers hardly ever reform. During the course of a prolonged ministry, I have seen thousands redeemed, many of them who were clear gone in sin, by Almighty grace rescued. In all parts of this land, and in some parts of other lands, I have seen those who were given up as incorrigible and lost, recovered for God and heaven, but how many confirmed gamblers have I seen converted from their evil ways? A thousand? No. Five hundred? No. Fifty? No. Two? No. One? No. I read in a book of one such rescued. I have no doubt there have been other cases, but no evil does its work so thoroughly and eternally as gambling. Such almost hopelessness of reformation ought to call forth from you deeper sympathy than you feel for any other unfortunate. Pity, by all means, for those who, shipwrecked and bruised among the timbers, have, nevertheless, climbed up to the fisherman's cabin, and found warmth and shelter, but more pity for those who never reach shore, but are dashed to death in the breakers. Be angry at the sin, but sympathize with its victims.

Be Careful What You Say

There is another sin that we are oftentimes called to be angry with, and that is fraud. We all like honesty, and when it is sacrificed we are vehement in denunciation. We hope that the detectives will soon come on the track of the absconding bank official, of the burglar who blew up the safe, of the clerk who skilfully changed the figures in the account book, of the falsifier who cured the loan on valueless property, of the agent because of his percentage, wrongfully admits a man the benefit of a life insurance policy when his head is ready to stop, and who comes from an ancestry characteristically short-lived. One act of fraud told in big head-lines in the morning papers rightfully aroused the nation's wrath. It is the interest of every good man and good woman who reads of the crime to have it exposed and punished. Let it go unscathed, and you put a premium on fraud, you depress public morals, you induce those who are on the fence between right and wrong to get down on the wrong side, and you put the business of the world on a down grade. The penitentiary must do their work. But while the merciless and the godless cry, "Good for him! I am glad he is within the prison doors!" Be industrious to work to find out if and what caused his moral overthrow. Perhaps he started in business life under a tricky firm, who gave him wrong notions of business integrity; perhaps there was a combination of circumstances almost unparalleled for temptation; perhaps there were alleviations, perhaps he was born wrong, and never got over it; perhaps he did not realize what he was doing, and you are a merciful man you will think of other persons which, though they may not excuse, will extenuate. Perhaps he has already repented, and is washed in the blood of the Lamb, and is as sure of heaven as you are. What an opportunity you have now for obeying the text. You were angry at the misdemeanor, but you are hopeful for the recovery of the recalcitrant. Blessed all prison reformers! Blessed are those governors and presidents who are glad when they have a chance to pardon! Blessed the forgiving father who welcomes home the prodigal! Blessed the dying thief who the Lord took with him to glory, saying, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise!"

There is another evil that we ought to abhor while we try to help the victim, and that is infidelity. It snatches the life preserver from the man afloat and affords not so much as a spar or a plank as substitute. It would extinguish the only light that has ever been kindled for the troubled and the lost. Let the spirit of infidelity take hold of a neighborhood, and in the town the marriage relation is a farce, and good morals give place to all styles of immorals. Let it take possession of this earth, and there would be no virtue left in the world's circumference. All the sins rebuked in the ten commandments would be dominant. The torch shall kindle the conflagration of the earth in the last catastrophe, will not do as much damage as would infidelity and agnosticism if they got a chance. Be angry with such theories of unbelief and hatred. Never laugh at the witticisms of those who would belittle the Bible with their jocularities. Quote to them the four lines of Whittier:

And weary seekers of the best,
We come back laden with our quest.
To find that all the sages said
Is in the Book our mothers read.

Have a lightning in your eye, and a flush on your cheek, and a frown on your brow for a dastard who would blot out the sun and moon and stars of Christianity, and leave all things in an Arctic night, equal to the darkness. You do well to be angry, but how about those who have been and that is more millions than you will ever know until the judgment day reveals everything. A chance comes your opportunity for gentleness, kindness, and sympathy. The probability is that if you have been plied with the same influences as this unbeliever, you would not be a Bible in all your house from cellar to attic. Perhaps he was in some important tracture swindled by a member of the church whose taking the sacrament was a sacrilege. Perhaps he read books, and heard agnostic lectures, and mingled in agnostic circles until he has been befogged, and needs your Christian help more than any one that you know of. Do not get into any labored argument about it.

IT HAS NEARLY FOUR HUNDRED MEMBERS, AND IS A GREAT POWER FOR GOOD AMONG BOSTON WORKERS

THE great workingmen's Bible class of the Ruggles Street Church, in the Roxbury district of Boston, is a recognized power for good in that city. The class has nearly four hundred members, and a very large majority of them were present at the annual dinner and reunion of the class on Decoration Day, which has been chosen as the regular day for the annual meeting. The speakers on this occasion were the new pastor of the church, the Rev. Amzi C. Dixon, Mr. Ezekiah Butterworth, the poet and writer, who has for many years been a member of this church, and Professor Ray Green Huling, Master of the Cambridge High School. Mr. C. C. Estey, the Gospel soloist, sang, and ministers from a number of churches were present. From four until six o'clock the class enjoyed games and sports of various kinds in the outdoor gymnasium connected with the church, and at six dinner was served, by the wives and daughters of the members of the class, in the vestry of the church.

This organization is an excellent illustration of the value of a Bible class for men. The class meets for the study of the Bible and for a general praise service every Sunday afternoon at half-past three o'clock. During the week, it conducts cottage prayer-meetings, temperance meetings and, in the summer time, open-air meetings in the small parks in the vicinity of the church and in the tenements. It has a Gospel Wagon and takes the Gospel to those who will not come to receive it.

Its present teacher is Mr. H. G. Wellington, who succeeded the organizer of the class, Mr. Samuel Russell, who has now become an ordained minister, and who is serving as pastor of a Baptist church, attended largely by workingmen, in Manchester, N. H.

th of Christianity. He may beat you at that. He is a whole artillery of weapons ready to open fire. Remember that no one was ever reformed for this life, saved for the life to come, by an argument; but in kindest and gentlest way, your voice subdued, ask him a few questions. Ask him if he had a Christian heritage; and if he says yes, ask him whether the old folks died happy. Ask him if he has ever heard of anyone going out of this life in raptures of infidelity and apostasy. Ask him if it is not a somewhat remarkable fact that the Bible, after so many years, sticks together, and that there are more copies of it in existence than ever before. Ask him if he knows of any better civilization than Christian civilization, and whether he thinks the teachings of Confucius or Christ are preferable. Ask him if he thinks it would be a fair thing in the Creator of all things to put in this world the human race, and give them no direct communication for their guidance, and if they did wrong, tell them of no way of recovery. I think if a famous infidel of our time, instead of being taken away instantaneously, had died in bed after weeks and months of illness, he would have revoked his teachings, and left for his beloved family consolations which they could not find in obscurities at which not one word of Holy Scripture was read, or at Fresh Pond Crematory, where no Christian benediction was pronounced. I do not positively say that in a prolonged illness there would have been a retraction, but I think there would.

The renowned infidel, Mr. Barker, after spending his life in lecturing against Christianity in all our cities, and in publishing large and elaborate books in depreciation of the Scriptures, in the closing years of his life wrote me that he had changed, and that he would like to stand in my pulpit and undo the evil that he had wrought for the most of his lifetime. I wrote him in congratulation for his soul's sake, that he had turned back from infidelity, but that I thought he could not do the work of a lifetime, and that he had talked so long on the wrong side, I did not think he could do anything by talking on the right side. The mercy of God is so great, that many of the mightiest antagonists of religion have in their last days been brought to repentance and eternal life. Let the thunder of your wholesome indignation be followed by the kindly rain of love. "Be ye angry, and sin not."

But let me confess at this crisis of my sermon that there is not an injunction in the Bible more difficult to obey than the words of the text. While it applauds a wholesome indignation it warns against sinful anger. And there is in all the realm of passion nothing more destructive than indiscriminate hate. First of all, it enervates the nervous ganglia. Those people who easily re up on little provocation go into high dudgeon, take offense without reason, snap you up quick, have injured their nerves, and there is only one thing worse ruin, and that is the brain, and we say of one that is given to frequent ebullitions of temper that he is an unbalanced man. A business man of our acquaintance said, "I cannot afford to get mad, it hurts me so." And if sinful anger damages the body, how much more it rives the disposition. There are thousands of men clerks in stores who would have been members of great business firms, and under-mechanics who would have been boss carpenters, and attorneys who would have been leading advocates, and preachers to congregations who are starving them to death, who might have had appreciative surroundings, who have been kept back and kept down by ungovernable tempers. The outbreak lasted only a little while, but it impeded a lifetime.

A man thoroughly mad, can say enough in two minutes to damage him for twenty years. It took only five minutes for the earthquake to destroy Caracas. One unfortunate sentence uttered in affront in a speech in the United States Senate, shut forever the door of the White House against one of the most brilliant men of the last century. You can never trust a horse that has once run away, and you do not feel like trusting a man who has just once lost his equilibrium. You need to drive your temper as a man drives a fractious span amid the explosions of a Fourth of July morning, or the pyrotechnics of a Fourth of July night, with curbed bit, taut rein, commanding voice, mastering yourself, and mastering what you drive. If you are naturally high tempered, do not unnecessarily go among irritations and provocations. Do not build a blast furnace next to a gunpowder mill. Then also such demonstrations of ungovernability belittle one. Men take out their lead pencils and in estimating such an one take fifty per cent. off. About the most hideous spectacle on earth is an angry man or woman, burning, not with the anger commended in my text, but with the sin reprehended. After such a display of gall, irascibility, virulence, his influence with many is forever gone. The world is full of politicians, doctors, lawyers, merchants, mechanics, ministers, housewives, who have by such explosions been blown to pieces.

I say to all young men, hoping to achieve financial, moral or religious success—control your tempers. The most of those who have largely succeeded in all departments were characterized by self-control. In battle they could calmly look at the bomb thrown at their feet, wondering whether it would explode. In commercial life, when panics smote the city, these men were placid, while others were yelling themselves hoarse at the Stock Exchange. While others nearly swooned because a certain stock had gone one hundred points down, they calmly waited until it would get one hundred points up. While the opposing attorney in the courtroom frothed at the mouth with rage because of something said on the other side, he of the equipoise put a glass of water to his lips in refreshment and proceeded with the remark, "As I was saying when the gentleman interrupted me." Self-control! What a glorious thing! We want it in the doctor feeling the pulse of one desperately ill. We want it in the engineer when the headlight of another train comes round the curve on the same track. We want it in Christian men and women in times when so much in church and state seems going to demolition—self-control!

Surpassing all other characters in the world's biography, stands Jesus Christ, wrathful against sin, merciful to the sinner. Witness his behavior toward the robed ruffians who demanded capital punishment for an offending woman: denunciation for their sinful hypocrisy; pardon for her sweet penitence. He did not speak of Herod as "His Majesty," or "His Royal Highness," but dared to compare him to a cunning fox, saying: "Go ye and tell that fox." But alert to the cry of suffering he finds ten lepers, and to how many of the ten awful invalids did he give convalescence and health? Ten. Rebuking Pharisaism in the most compressed sentence in all the vocabulary of anathema: "Ye serpents! Ye generation of vipers! How can ye escape the damnation of hell?" Yet looking upon Peter with such tenderness that no word was spoken, and not a word was needed, for the look spoke louder than words. "And the Lord looked upon Peter, and Peter went out and wept bitterly." Oh, what a look it must have been to break down the swarthy fisherman apostle! It was such a hurt look; such a beseeching look; such a loving look; such a forgiving look! Was there in any other being since time began such a combination of wrath against wrong and compassion for the wrong-doer? "Lion of Judah's tribe!" Hear that! "Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world!" Hear that! Defying the mightiest government of the world, the Roman government, yet rubbing his hand just below the forehead of the blind man until the optic nerve of him who was born sightless is created, and the sunlight has two new paths to tread. Best illustration the world ever saw of anger without sin: Anger against the abominations which have mauled and blasted the earth from its deepest cavern to its highest cliff, but so much pity for the sinning and suffering nations that he allowed them to transfix him upon two pieces of wood nailed across each other, on a day that was dark as the night; the windows of heaven shut because the immortals could not bear to look down upon the assassination of the loveliest being that ever walked the shore of the lakes, or without pillow or blanket slept on the cold mountains.

Like him, let us hate iniquity with complete hatred, but like him may we help those who are overthrown, and be willing to suffer for their restoration. Then, although at the opening of this discourse our text may have seemed to command us to do an impossible thing, we will, at the close of this sermon, with a prayer to God for help, be more rigid and determined than ever before against that which is wrong, while at the same time we shall feel so kindly toward all the erring, and work so hard for their rescue, that we will realize that we have scaled the Alpine, the Himalayan height of my text, which enjoins: "Be ye angry, and sin not."

CERTAIN series of events, occurring in the Philippines during the last six months, have practically brought peace to the Islands. Prosperity is now a question of reconstruction, development, and good faith. Various things have brought about this peace. One is the softening influence of time on the minds of the Filipino people. To retain peace, we must fulfil our many promises, spoken, written and implied, to our new wards. Time heals wounds and hard feelings. If we, as a government, now act with absolute fairness, the future promises happiness and prosperity throughout the archipelago.

The Army, the Navy, the Civil Commission with Judge Taft at its head, the Filipinos themselves and the Washington administration, have one and all contributed to the satisfactory conditions to-day prevailing at Manila. First we administered the rebels a severe drubbing; the Army and Navy did that. This breaks a people's spirit; in this case it did much to coerce the natives into accepting our sovereignty. It means death, wounds and disease—the horrors of war. To the Islands it meant, among other things, the slaughtering of many hundreds of men who, with wooden swords and bows and arrows, essayed to fight against Krag-Jorgensens in the hands of marksmen. Families were scattered; houses and villages were burned; crops were destroyed; the ground remained untilled; property was confiscated and destroyed—there was a train of suffering that one must have witnessed fully to appreciate. For four long years the Filipinos stood this and their spirit remained unbroken.

The Civil Commission arrived and proceeded to study the situation in all its bearings upon the work they had in hand, namely, to establish a civil government for the Philippines. The instructions given to the Commission by the Secretary of War were explicit, and showed that the Washington administration realized the advisability of proving to the Filipinos, by deeds and not by words, what the future under American sovereignty had in store for them.

Sept. 1, 1900, the Commission became the legislative body for the Islands. The Army remained the executive branch of the Government. The Commission proceeded to enact certain legislation looking towards the ultimate establishment of a civil control. Early in 1901, having made all necessary preparation, the Commission went to the provinces there to organize civil, provincial, and municipal governments, and thus show by deed what we proposed doing for the Islanders. During the next five months the Commissioners travelled very generally over the archipelago, organizing in those provinces where the prevailing conditions of peace and tranquillity permitted, liberal forms of self-government. Under these the natives were given a greater degree of autonomy than they had ever dreamed of getting from Spain, as well as a fairer, better and surer system than they had ever established for themselves in the days of the "Filipino Republic." This action gave the country at large actual and real contact with the purposes of our Government, and the result in the Filipino mind was excellent. The Commission was welcomed everywhere. As far as possible, municipal and provincial offices were given to natives, while ultimate American control was retained in order to prevent abuses.

The expressed desires of the Filipinos as to method and detail of the Government set up over them were acceded to whenever possible. The Commission recognized the fact that the best men among the Filipinos had been, or still were, among the insurgents; therefore they appointed, or permitted the election of such men to office.

According to the degree of civilization and ability at self-government evidenced by the inhabitants of the different islands, the Commission varied the form of government promulgated. In a few words, the Commission's work can be called the establishment of a series of protectorates, or autonomous governments, all controlled, ultimately and finally, by the central establishment at Manila, which, according to our promises, is to be promulgated next July, with Judge Taft at its head.

While these events were influencing the Filipino people in distant provinces, the developments at Manila were likewise working towards peace, while in the districts still unruly, the drubbing process was continued. The organization of a civil service to fill civil positions in the insular government, in which system it was clearly set forth that, other things being equal, Filipinos would be preferred for such positions over any one else, was a further earnest of our good intentions towards the Islanders. The intimation, clearly expressed in many ways, that the much discussed and trouble provoking question of the religious orders would be settled, or would settle itself, to the satisfaction of the natives, created another wave of pro-American feeling, as did also the actual testimony of progress made towards organizing and maintaining unsectarian schools. The Filipinos have always wanted educational facilities; Spain was not inclined to provide them, and it was a good sign, they argued, when we did so.

The work of the Federal Party, composed of prominent Filipinos, including many former insurgents, who believed the best fate for their country was peace under American sovereignty, and who labored to convince their less reasonable countrymen of the correctness and common sense of these opinions, added much to the influences already working towards peace.

These developments, together with others similar that I have not space to enumerate, prepared the country at large to accept, in a spirit favorable to the United States, the capture of Aguinaldo and his subsequent message to his people in which he counselled peace and American control. The capture of the Filipino leader came as a dramatic and effective climax, not to our words—for Spain had deceived them with words and they were slow to believe—but to our actual deeds, which proved conclusively to the Islanders that we meant well by them. All we had accomplished preceding the taking of Aguinaldo made possible the desirable results which followed his capture. My experience in the Islands convince me I am right in saying the Filipinos will be content with fair and just treatment. They want peace, prosperity and happiness, and their country offers them their desires. They will be glad to take them through our hands. If they are abused, or misled or deceived, or if they believe they are so treated, they will fight. They are a country which makes it easy for them to undertake hostilities. If we continue to do well by them, if we fulfil our promises, written and implied, they should give no real trouble. If we fail in our promises, they will be the spirit to die for their ideals, or in the righting of their wrongs. This they have proved.

To-day the archipelago is politically at peace. Generals Cailles and Malvar, whose past deeds would seem to preclude hopes of amnesty, are about the only leaders still holding out against us. They are but bandits, and the military authorities treat them as such. The news of their capture or surrender may come before these words are in print.

It has been announced that the General, or Central Government for the Philippine Islands will be established July 1. This means, necessarily, an end of army control, and the return home of a large portion of the present army of occupation, and the consequent reduction of American expenses out there. The Filipinos are anxious and waiting for this step. It has been promised them, and they would naturally prefer civil to military control. All development during the past year has led them to expect the step announced for next month, and if we do not fulfil our obligation, the Filipinos will question our motives. Mistrust, which has but just been itself away, will come back, and much good will be undone.

The recent decisions by the Supreme Court, while they failed to establish the past or actual status of the Philippines, showed that the Island's future was for Congress to determine. Speculation at once became rife as to when Congress would take action in this matter, and as to what powers a President had to act in the interim. The despatches from Washington to-night clearly say that the Executive has determined not to call an extra session of Congress; hence there can be no Congressional action in Philippine affairs until next December. As for the interim, the President finds that the provisions of the Spooner Amendment give him ample power to govern the Islands in all their requirements. It is announced that the Dingley rates upon goods from the Philippines will continue to be collected, and that the recommendations of the Commission as to the tariff on imports into the Islands will be put into effect; and further, that no change will be made in the policy hitherto pursued and announced in regard to the Philippine Islands. This means that the central civil government will be established this summer—in other words, that we will keep our promise. It will be of vast advantage to ourselves and to the Filipinos if we do, in the letter and in the spirit. By long months of effort, we have won their beginnings of the trust and the faith of a Malay and Oriental people. Should we shatter these beginnings, it will be a bitter disappointment, and the Filipinos don't take disappointment easily. We have led them to expect much of us; just how much we do not know, because we do not yet know the Filipino mind, but it would be unfortunate if we proved to be a disappointment. Whether the Filipino can be a good friend or not we do not know from actual experience, but we do know he can be a very troublesome enemy.

Old Spanish residents of the Philippines tell you tales of the charm of the country and its people in the days before the rebellion; of open hospitality, of contentment and of general happiness. If we govern fairly, wisely and well, and keep our promises, these desirable attributes may, to a great extent, return to one of the fairest regions in all the world.

Peace in the Philippines.

"THE BLUE-RIBBON KNIGHT"

FOR upwards of a third of a century, Francis Murphy has made temperance his life work. This old "blue-ribbon" leader, with his homely eloquence and earnest endeavor, has persuaded hundreds of liquor dealers, saloon keepers, and bartenders to turn to some honest employment. In many cities and towns there were organized clubs of ex-liquor dealers who joined the Murphy movement. Mr. Murphy made it a point for years to induce saloon men to attend special meetings held for liquor dealers only. No other temperance worker could command the respect of that element as he did when at the height of his power. He had probably the largest personal acquaintance with saloon men of any individual in this country. His intimate knowledge of every detail of the liquor traffic, and his ability to judge human nature, gave him a power over men that has hardly been equaled in temperance work.

Murphy's motto was, "Nothing but the grace of Almighty God can save a drunkard." He never spoke ill of the men engaged in the liquor trade, even while denouncing the saloon in the most scathing terms. In the smaller cities, he would visit the saloons and induce the proprietors to agree to close up on certain days, or nights, while he was in town, so that all might come to his meetings. He rarely failed to accomplish his mission. His most effective argument for the reformation of saloon men was his appeal to them for the sake of their families and children, and so powerful was this plea that few could resist it.

Once a man came into a crowded meeting, staggering up the aisle, crying: "Oh, Francis Murphy, I have fallen again." Murphy stopped in the midst of a prayer, grabbed the man by the hand and fairly lifted him up onto the platform, simply saying, "You're all right now, John. Praise God, you didn't fall; you only slipped a little." The man signed the pledge fourteen times, with a year, and broken it every time; but he signed again that night, and is to-day one of the most respected merchants of a western city. He was an ex-saloon keeper; he never drank a drop of liquor again. In twenty-five years multitudes of people have signed the Murphy pledge. Mr. Murphy never lost an opportunity to induce a young man to sign; he would say: "You're a fine fellow! You can't afford to drink rum. Better start right now; sign the pledge and let whiskey alone."

Such are some of the characteristic methods of this wonderfully persuasive temperance worker, whose arguments have won over to the cause a great host of adherents. It will be many years before the "Blue-Ribbon Knight" is forgotten, and his name will long be held in esteem by lovers of temperance throughout the world.

A FAMINE CRY FROM SHANSI

"Our People are Perishing With Hunger," Write the Native Christians of Five Churches
--- Horrors of the Famine --- Our Whole Nation Now Helping Stricken China

IN all the history of human suffering, it would be difficult to find any condition more pitiful and yet more heroic than that which is presented in the letter below. It is from the native elders and deacons of the China Christian Churches in Hong-tong, Ping-jiang, Ku-huh, Sil-ches and Ta-nung (all in Shansi). It is written in Chinese characters, which have been translated by Rev. F. C. H. Dreyer, formerly missionary in that province, who has sent the translation to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is as follows:

We send you greetings of peace. When we heard that you had arrived safely at Han-kow, in spite of much suffering during the journey, we were greatly comforted on your account. When, however, we think of the great sufferings of the many missionaries who did not early escape, and who have been put to death, our grief is indeed great. We are glad, however, that although so many have suffered, those of four or five of those who remained in the south of the province have been spared.

The calamities that have befallen the Chinese Christians have also been very great. Their steadfastness has been severely tested. Many of the brethren, however, through God's mighty preserving power, are much more zealous than they were before. From this it is manifest that nothing man can do can separate the love of God.

The suffering among all the Christians has been too great, although they have escaped from within a step of death by sword, it has only been to meet with hunger and starvation. Not only are many in great want, but some have no food to eat day after day. Happily our heavenly Father has bestowed mercy on us, for we have received letters from Shih-hai and Peng informing that an effort is being made to relieve our distress.

As, for our Shansi Christians, who are like a flock without shepherd! We do not for the moment speak of their sorrows, even their lives we do not know how to save. We have no appointed brethren to help in the important matter of distribution of relief.

Please send quickly, that we may speedily deliver our brethren from their great and urgent distress. We hope that peace will soon be established, and that the pastors will be able to quickly return and reorganize the affairs of the Church. We respectfully send our greetings of peace to all the missionaries. From the brethren for whom you have entertained anxious thought:

Rev. E. Folke, another missionary of the China Inland Mission in Shansi, now in New York, has recently received a letter from Shansi, the writer of which (a native Christian) confirms the statements in the foregoing letter as to the great suffering owing to the famine.

A Time for Christians to Act

Rev. F. Howard Taylor, son of the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the famous missionary and founder of the China Inland Mission, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the powerful presentation of the famine situation:

Fresh news of the famine in North China continues to come in, from time to time; and very pitiful news it is. Exact details it is scarcely possible to obtain, as there are now no foreigners in the famine district. Reliable information, however, is being received from five Christian sources: from trusted men, coming down to the coast on mission business, or sent as deputies from the native churches, to bring tidings of their condition and their sufferings, to those on whose sympathy they know they can rely. And this, added to the testimony of missionary eye-witnesses at an earlier stage of the famine, gives a sufficiently graphic, and most pathetic picture.

"In the summer of last year, when the foreigners in North China had to escape for their lives—if they could—things were already very bad. Indeed, two members of the China Inland Mission whose furloughs were overdue and greatly needed, had a month or two previously postponed their return home, that they might help the famine sufferers, out of their own private means. For two successive years, drought had reduced the harvests to such an extent, that only those who were well-to-do were able to obtain sufficient food for their needs. The poor were already, in many districts, living on bark stripped from the trees, on roots dug from the ground, on grass, and on flour plentifully adulterated with lime.

"Now, nearly a year later, things are evidently very much worse. In the Province of Shansi—where the suffering is greatest, and can scarcely be exaggerated—in the larger part of Ho-nan, and in western Shan-tung, not only the native Christians (many of whom were robbed a year ago of all they possessed), but the common people also, are suffering all the pains of starvation. The corpses of those who die are not only not interred, but are even used for food. Sadder things than this also seldom does so signal an opportunity occur for heaping coals of fire on an enemy's head. In the interests of future commercial relations, and still more in the interests of a right appreciation of the meaning of practical Christianity, now is a golden opportunity indeed in our relations with China. They will see that Christianity is something more than mere words, that it is real, and practical, and divine; and the result both on commerce and the progress of the truth in China cannot but be very marked.

"I trust that the action of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in coming so promptly and so generously forward in this matter will be heartily endorsed by its readers everywhere.

F. HOWARD TAYLOR, M.D.

Some Contributors' Letters

Meanwhile general interest in the relief movement is awakening throughout our own land, where the efforts of missionaries have been put forth to supplement THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's presentation of China's sore need. Contributions to the relief fund, it is now hoped, will come in in sufficient volume to enable our missionary committee on the field to do prompt and effective work in saving thousands of famine sufferers. We give below extracts from a few of the letters received:

L. B. Paterson, N. J., writes: "As I opened my Bible this morning I first read these words (I. John 3: 1), 'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, and therefore his love toward us ought to constrain us to help our needy brother in this far-off land. We do not give our own, but God's gifts given to us for his own glory.'"

"May God put it into the hearts of the rich to send their thousands. I want a little share in helping the poor, starving sufferers of China. I herewith send a dollar," writes "C. C." Brodhead, N. Y.

"It may mean the cup of water or the bread of life to some helpless, suffering one," is the language of Mrs. S. E. Neterer ($5). Whatcom, Wash.

E. S. Ravena, Nebraska, writes: "Enclosed please find P. O. Money Order for $5, for the China Famine Relief Fund. May God bless your good work. It is for humanity, for Christianity, and for civilization and commerce."

Miss Alice G. Wasson, Canonsburg, Pa. ($5), writes: "From the Junior C. E. Society, First Presbyterian Church. Our boys and girls denied themselves luxuries for a week, and some earned their offerings."

"In no other way can America so well show to the Chinese their desire for saving them for Christ, than in helping them now. May God's blessing go with every penny sent, and may it be the means of bringing them to Christ as well as saving them from this suffering now," writes Mr. and Mrs. Moore, Mantua, O. ($50).

Rev. J. M. Markwick, Ovid Centre, N. Y. ($50), writes: "My little daughter has circulated a subscription paper for the famine-stricken people in Shensi and Shansi. When a missionary in China some years ago, in company with a very devoted brother, I went to Shensi province to assist in the relief of the sufferers by the great famine which was then desolating that part of China. I trust your effort will help much to mitigate the affliction."

W. H. Herron, Cooper, Tex., writes: "Ida Herron is gone to heaven. She died on May 14th. She subscribed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for her father, a Christmas present, and I prize it higher than anything she could have given me, and now the paper gives me a chance to do some mission work in her name. She had $21.90 wages that she worked for, and I want to help the class of people she loved to help. I want to do it in her name."

All contributions should be addressed, China Relief Work, 92 Bible House, New York City. Every contribution, however small, will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

are happening continually. Those who are familiar with the tales of suffering and horror that are incident to an Oriental famine will be able to fill in the ghastly picture for themselves. Enough has been said to show that the condition of things is deplorable to the last degree. The Government, demoralized and disorganized, is really unable to help its own people.

"Do not these appalling conditions present a rare opportunity to the leading Christian nations of the world? China, or more correctly the Government of China, deserved the strongest condemnation of all right-thinking men for the unparalleled occurrences of last year. They had it, and felt it. The horrors of war, sad to say aggravated in some instances by unnecessary barbarity, have come upon them, as the result of the Boxer madness. But now, after they have been chastised with scorpions, we cannot shut our ears to the lamentable cry of millions—literally millions—of miserably perishing, and in many cases wholly innocent sons of the soil. Have we not now a chance to show them magnanimity, at a time when practical sympathy will be doubly valued, because it is so manifestly undeserved?

"China is well enough aware that she has offended, and mortally offended, the nations of the West. If at such a time the countries most deeply aggrieved come to her rescue, and by generous contributions do all they can to mitigate the sufferings of the hunger-stricken people—in a district including not less than fifty or sixty millions—it cannot but make a profound impres-

MAG; A STORY OF THE SLUMS

...BY...
MARY C. FRANCIS

MAG had an inauspicious entrance into the world. The ill-smelling tenement was already overcrowded, and in the small room it seemed as though there could not possibly be space enough for another.

The white, haggard-faced mother looked hopelessly on the little countenance; then, while trying to say something to Mrs. Harrigan who already had seven of her own, she gasped and died. Mrs. Harrigan probably understood; at any rate she took Mag, the father having disappeared inside of a penal institution for a period of twenty years, and the fourth child existed and grew in some mysterious way known only to those who have such unhealthy force as semi-starving, neglect, and a constant tussle for existence.

There was hardly a time when she did not work, under Mr. Harrigan's ungentle inducements; or, if not working, she was hanging about the street gang; and many a tough youth came off second best before her hard little fists. At the age of seven she was the neighborhood terror; at ten she was known to the police; at fourteen she, as a belle, but none the less a "scrapper." In a grim and unsavory world of her own, she was supreme, skilled in many devices, confident of her charms, totally without fear and capable of diverse temperamental exhibitions. Had her reddish-brown hair ever been properly dressed, the full glory of it might have been seen. Tumbled and tousled as it was, it was a magnificent thing; her dark skin was clear and rosy; her brown eyes by turns innocent and bold; her red lips were given to laughing mockingly. She had chased the drunken O'Reilly out of his house with a broomstick, and tended Mrs. O'Reilly and the sick child night and day until they recovered. Then she spent her savings from the sweat shop on them, and went out and got drunk herself, after which she indulged in her favorite pastime of quarreling and looting for a good chance to lead her "buddy right."

It was on a hot evening at the close of a variegated day, that Mag was idly leaning against the lamp-post on the corner. She was in a sullen mood, her fieriness, due half to hunger, half to still wrath concerning a rival who was lately threatening her supremacy. Her eyes flashed viciously, and she stamped her foot deep in the dust of the street.

"Beg pardon, but will you kindly tell me where Mrs. McCoy lives?"

A soft, sweet voice, with its refined accents, fell musically on Mag's ears, and in the air, which a moment before had been laden with odors that never blew from Araby, wafted to her a delicate scent. She looked up with a smile.

"Have heard of her from a mutual friend," went on the stranger, "and I will very much to find her this evening. I have a message for her—and then."

Mag almost tottered on her feet. "These" were lilies, pure, graceful; but it was not their exquisite beauty, though seen for the first time, that had won the soul of this girl. She was taken captive by the personality of the woman who addressed her. The blue eyes looked straight down through the dark ones into her very heart, at a strange sensation, which she did not know was earnestness—that anchor for a woman's life—flooded her with being. Mag Harrigan had never bent her knees in her life, but now her spirit knelt before this unseen power.

"I'll take you," she said. "It's right down this way." The two stepped forward, but around the corner, tearfully with clanging gong came the ambulance on a "buddy" call.

"Look out," shrieked Mag; but too late, for her stilled companion, who reeled almost under the horses' hoofs, while the driver's eyes protruded at what seemed to be the inevitable. It would have been had not Mag, with the peculiar litheness of the streets, flung herself forward, and with one twist of her muscular arms snatched her out, and tossed her, somewhat bruised, but virtually unhurt, to the edge of the narrow sidewalk, uttering a vociferous remark meantime, that soared even above the din of the crowd. It all happened before the running policeman could reach the spot.

"Are you hurt?" asked Mag, anxiously, lifting her companion up.

"No, not at all; thanks to you, my brave girl. But y—y—y!" The blood was streaming down one side of Mag's face from a big bruise above the left temple.

"Oh, that ain't nothin'," said Mag, jauntily wiping the blood away. "Can't some o' you loafers git o' th' lady's way, so's we can git out o' this?"

That was the beginning. That evening, after they had found Mrs. McCoy, and the lilies and more substantial articles had been delivered, Mag permitted Miss Bradley to bathe the bruised and swollen brow. It was the first gentle touch the girl had ever known in her life. Blows she had both taken and given, but this soft, caressing touch of white fingers, the magnetic current of love and sympathy that coursed through her with that contact, the low, "Does it feel better now, my dear?" unloosed the girl's higher forces. She thrilled with the first sweet emotion that had ever come into her life. Katherine Bradley knew better than to make the mistake of preaching to this girl; but before they parted that evening, she said, her soft white fingers closing over Mag's: "And, my dear, if you wish to please me, won't you try not to use such shocking language as you did when you pulled me out from under the horses' feet? It is unwomanly, and now you say you wish to be different."

A furious flush surged up under the girl's skin. She had never felt ashamed before. "I'll try, Miss Bradley," she said, in a low voice; "but I've always said everything I wanted to, and it'll be hard."

"MAG FLUNG HERSELF FORWARD, AND TOSSED HER TO THE SIDEWALK"

As time went on, Miss Bradley sometimes thought that it was not hard for Mag, but simply impossible. The girl devoted herself to her, and she had much opportunity, for as the summer advanced, there seemed to be more and more necessary to be done in that squalid district; sick and dying babies, overworked mothers, the improvident and the shiftless, all made claims. Katherine went more and more often to the locality, and Mag was ever at her side, an invaluable helper, guide, assistant, companion. It was Mag who looked out that no imposition was made; who knew whether the story of four months' rent due was truth or falsehood; who did errands, ran hither and thither, joyfully performed every service, no matter how small, for Miss Bradley, and who was her self-constituted escort throughout the district at all hours, until the two came to be known as "The Twins" to a derisive contingent. But Mag's own progress, Miss Bradley was forced to confess after several months, was of the doubtful and backsliding order: better and worse by turns, sometimes angelic for days, then atoning with a violent relapse. Her personal devotion was undoubted, and her help was valuable, and Miss Bradley kept on hoping. One phase that Mag displayed gave her concern more than once; she resolutely refused to accept any financial assistance. This she had declined with such scorn the one time that Miss Bradley had offered it, that it was never repeated, though its need was frequently obvious.

The days slipped into weeks, and the weeks into months. Then, one day, Miss Bradley smelt liquor on Mag's breath, and noticed the unmistakable signs of dissipation on the girl. Her gentle reproach, uttered in softest tones, while her big blue eyes looked down into the very core of the girl's life, as ever, tortured Mag unspeakably, but she was too proud to show it. She continued on the tour with Katherine until it was over, escorted her to the car, then disappeared. Two days later, when Katherine went down, she could not find her, and for the first time since she had entered the district, on the evening when Mag had dragged her out from mutilation or worse, she went through her rounds alone and felt unutterably lonely. One of those unaccountable attractions that frequently draw human souls together, no matter how widely separated their stations, had formed a permanent bond for these two, and each suffered from the trifling alienation; but Miss Bradley did not know that Mag shadowed her and scarcely lost sight of her.

The next afternoon she went down again, partly because she had duties there, partly because she wanted to see Mag, if she could meet her without seeming to look for her. Just before dinner time, coming down a dark stairway, she ran into a figure that proved to be another worker, who hurriedly informed her that the instructor for a certain class in the Mothers' Evening School was indisposed and could not give the regular lesson, and asked her to take it. Katherine readily consented, but added, "I am hungry. Where can we go to get something to eat?" As she spoke she felt at her belt; the dangling leather case was gone. A search did not reveal it.

"A new one, too," said Katherine, laughing, "carried for the first time and more money in it than usual."

That evening, when Katherine was half-way through the lesson, she recognized, in the half light of the dim hallway, Mag's face. The girl was peering in through the open door, but cautiously disappeared in the shadows before she knew she was recognized. Katherine's heart leaped.

"Poor girl," she thought. "I wonder if I really said anything harsh to her the other day." She went on with the instruction, but decided in an instant what she would do to restore the old relations. She had lost her purse, she had not a penny; she would go to Mag after the lesson and borrow car-fare.

Mag, half fearful that she had been discovered, stole away and did what she had not done for a long time, threw herself down face foremost on the bed in her small, untidy room in the Harrigan flat and cried. Not two hours before she had exulted, with the old, almost forgotten sense of the days before her soul had cried out for love and sympathy. Hurt, not so much by Miss Bradley's tender admonition, as by the realization that she had fallen sadly in her attempt to lead a better life, she had instantly lapsed into one of the old fierce moods, and had felt ready for anything. With this feeling on her, she strolled idly along, when looking down, her eye was caught by a new gray chamois bag, one of the kind now affected as a pocket-book. Broken from the tiny chain, it had fallen at the foot of a dark stairway in the gloom, and had she not been looking down, it would have passed unnoticed. Its sides bulged significantly. She picked it up, and sauntered nonchalantly along until she returned to the unsavory flat. In the privacy which she was able to command at irregular intervals, she examined it. The result stunned her. Bills, of a denomination she had never seen before, a gold piece, silver change! The array diverted her thoughts from the bitterness that had occupied them. There was no indication of the owner; no card, no initials, and the contents would deck her, not in purple and fine linen, but in East Side finery for many a day. With a delirium of joy, she kissed the nearest crisp bill; but, even as it touched her lips, something stung her. She dropped the money, her face crimsoned; the old, stormy, defiant look came over her. With all her faults, Mag was honest; never before had she even been tempted to take what did not belong to her. Now, her evil angel in the ascendancy, the opportunity fallen like a ripe plum into her very hand, smarting with a sense of backsliding, two forces struggled. The battle was brief.

"I'll keep it," she said, with a sharp indrawing of the breath. "I found it; it was lost; there is no name. I don't know whose it is, and I need it."

Then she remembered Katherine Bradley, and stood in silent agony for a moment. "She will never know."

Our Armenian Orphan Work Closes

FIVE FRUITFUL YEARS OF LOVING LABOR --- MISSIONARIES TELL OF SAD YOUNG LIVES TRANSFORMED

IT would be difficult to find in the whole range of practical philanthropy a more inspiring and gratifying illustration of the results that flow from Christian benevolence than that which is contained in the letters from missionaries in Armenia, which we publish to-day.

Five years ago, the readers of this journal, touched with sympathy by the persecution and sufferings of the Armenian survivors at the terrible massacres in that unfortunate country, reached out hands of help, and, by timely aid, saved many thousands of lives. When the hapless orphans, bereft of parents by the Kurdish slaughterers, sought the refuge afforded by the Christian missions, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the hearty co-operation of its readers, assumed responsibility for the support and education of a large number of these waifs at various stations in Armenia, notably Van, Harpoot, Urfa and Mardin.

Now, the responsibility is ended, the pledge redeemed, and we reluctantly bid farewell to the little army of Armenian boys and girls who, during these five years, have been so close to our own hearts and to the hearts of our readers. And what a transformation has been accomplished in that short half decade! Ragged, friendless, and forlorn, we found them, some with wounds and bruises, half famished with hunger, and their little hearts well-nigh broken with sorrow over the loss of parents and friends who had fallen in the great massacres. Now, these wretched waifs, many of them once mere bundles of bones, covered with rags, have grown, under the fostering care of our Christian missionaries, to be noble and self-supporting young men and women. The photographs from Van on these two pages, tell the story of the moral and physical redemption of these Armenian orphans. As it was in Van, so also at all the other stations where our friends have been supporting orphan charges. It is the compact record of a Christ-like work undertaken for the sake of humanity and of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

We give the letters below, and commend them to the careful perusal of all our readers, and especially of those who have had a share in the rescue of the Armenian orphans:

Our Little Charges at Van

VAN, April 20, 1901.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:

Through your kindness, and that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers and friends, our Van Orphanage has been receiving a quarterly payment of $75, for three years, and as the next payment will be the last of these thus pledged, it is every way fitting that an acknowledgment should be made of the great kindness which has thus been bestowed on us, and, at the same time, an idea given of what is being accomplished by this work. I enclose a few photos, which you may possibly think best to give your readers.

The first is a group of children, applicants for admission to the orphanage, most of whom were accepted, and are still with us, while some have gone out, and a few were, for different reasons, refused. The group includes those who happened to be present one day when we were taking photographs. Very many have been received whose appearance would appeal much more strongly to your sympathies.

Of the nearly six hundred children who have been taken at different times, a very large proportion were those whose fathers were killed during the troubles of 1895-96, or who died very soon after, in consequence of those troubles. The months which immediately followed those terrible days witnessed the death of many thousands, attributable to the fright and exposure of those weeks and to epidemics which quickly followed.

Transforming Young Lives

A considerable number of the children received had mothers surviving, but with absolutely no means of providing for themselves or their children. During the subsequent years, when practically famine conditions prevailed in the land, thousands of these widows and orphans would inevitably have perished but for the prompt and generous aid which was poured in upon us then through the beneficence of Christian friends in America and Europe. In all this work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has borne a most prominent and efficient part.

have been received within the sheltering fold of the orphanage, exchanged their rags and filthy warm, and clean, though clothing—all, by the way, manufactured by the boys themselves, the weaving the cloth to the tu out the finished garments—learned to sit regularly at a where there is enough to eat and sleep in a clean and comfortable bed, instead of begging all from door to door, and then down somewhere, hungry and cold. Besides this, they are being inducted into the mysteries of letters and numbers, and those who are old enough are beginning to use the use of the saw and plan the shuttle and loom, the awl and waxed end, or the needle and sors, as the case may be. In a new world has opened to them, a world moreover whose vista extends beyond the borders of time, and reveals the jeweled walls and pearly gates of the Jerusalem. Yes, the change has come over their young lives almost beyond compute, and pleasant to see that most of them are really improving to the full the advantages which they enjoy. Here, for instance, is Mano, a boy of about thirteen, who has been here less than a year, and who knew his letters when he came from a wild village away off among the lofty mountains which bound our beautiful lake on the south. A village, moreover, whose inhabitants nominally accepted Islam at the time of the massacre, thinking thus to be able to save their lives, and return to their former faith at a more favorable time, but were nearly all slain before two years had passed. In these few months he has advanced to the fourth class which children ordinarily take three years to reach, is in fractions in arithmetic, and has written a very interesting and well-expressed letter to his parents, and, best of all, gives evidence that the grace of God has really taken hold of his heart and life. Of course, this is an exceptional case, but most of the children show that they are appreciating their advantages and striving diligently to improve them. While nearly all those who came from the villages say they had known nothing of the Saviour or the requirements of the moral law, there is now a most gratifying carefulness in conduct and speech, which tells that before-unknown truths are taking hold of heart and life.

Equipped for Life's Battle

Another picture gives us a group of boys who have gone out from the institution to begin the responsibilities of an independent existence. The photo was taken at the time of a little party given to those in the front rows, while those in the two back rows are boys who happened to be within reach so as to be invited to share the pleasures of the occasion, though they had already been out for a considerable time. The four who stand immediately behind Dr. Ray graduated from the orphanage and our high school in 1899, spent the following year in most faithful and acceptable work as teachers among their people, three of them in as many villages, and the fourth in the same school. Their thoroughly earnest Christian lives and efficient work led us to feel that a little further training, especially in Biblical and theological lines, would fit them to add efficient evangelistic service to their educational work, and so we placed them in for a further two years' course of study. It is already becoming delightful work for me to travel among the villages and find so many of them our orphan boys or the girls we have given in marriage, with their husbands to welcome them.

Missionaries Send News of Blessing

GROWN TO BE STRONG CHRISTIAN MEN AND WOMEN, THE ORPHANS BLESS THEIR BENEFACTORS

Everywhere the work we have done for the children has found high appreciation among the people, and now that they are coming to understand that our purpose is to persuade men to enter the kingdom of heaven, without urging them to sever their connection with the loved natural Christian Church, they are the more ready to give respectful and interested attention.

The Influence of the Orphans

The work which those of our boys who graduate and engage in teaching will be able to accomplish for the elevation of their people is not one from which, of course, we expect the most; but we are already finding that those who have gone out before carrying their studies very far, and are engaging in farming or working at their trades, are effecting gradual but decided changes in the moral and religious life of their people. The benefit they will be able to exert will, of course, be slow, but the experience of former years shows that it is valuable. When nearly every village can have two or three such enlightened and Christian families within its bounds a decided difference may be expected in the character of the people.

Yours most sincerely,
G. C. RAYNOLDS.

How the Work Thrives at Oorfa

Miss Corinna Shattuck, the famous missionary at Oorfa, in making her closing report of our orphan work there, sends this glowing letter:

OORFA, April 27.
Nine months or more after our great distress at the close of 1895, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having nobly aided in saving the survivors of the massacres, wished to undertake the support of needy Oorfa orphans. The large gift made by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at that time enabled us to extend our premises and put them in order for the great crowd of one hundred and twelve boys we were obliged to have in the Mission House the first year, before the Germans arrived to care for the orphans being supported by funds from Germany.

Nine are in Oorfa High School, one to graduate this year; one is a shoemaker, two are weavers, two are cabinet-makers, one is a yemene (summer shoes) maker; others cut wood, carry water, help in cooking, table work, etc. Fifteen are in Grammar School; one of these is a yemene-maker, five are in Primary School; four not in school, but have learned to read and write, and during winter evenings continued to study; of Those who went last autumn are working well, and getting through the year profitably, being high-spirited fellows. They will come out well if they can get work during the summer and return for a couple of years more.

We cannot properly thank you, our co-workers, who, without knowing the children, have done so long and so faithfully for them. The children always mention their CHRISTIAN HERALD friends in their prayers.

Most sincerely yours,
CORINNA SHATTUCK.

A Bright Report from Harpoot

Rev. Mr. Barnum, of Harpoot, has this cheering final report to make to our orphan patrons:

HARPOOT, TURKEY,
May 6, 1901.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:
Yours of February 20, with check for $150 for the support of orphans, is received, and in behalf of the more than 900 orphans whom we support, I give you sincere thanks. Your aid has been most acceptable and efficient from the time this work was begun. From first to last, we have had about 1,200 children under our care; those who were orphaned and made helpless by the massacres of November, 1895. Some are now able to care for themselves; some have been adopted by friends, and some of the girls have found homes by marriage.

It has been delightful to see the growth in knowledge and character in these children, most of whom would have been practically outcasts, if they had not come under our care. This is a great responsibility which the Lord clearly puts upon us, and we are doing the best we can to prepare these children for future usefulness.

These letters, from the faithful workers who have had the care of the orphans ever since their rescue, will bring a sense of real delight to the hearts of the band of consecrated men and women who generously supplied

All have the Bible most freely in their hands and love it, and know it far better than the average American boys I met, as tested over and over again, on my recent visit home. Eight of your boys are members of the Christian Band in our Home, who meet regularly for mutual help and prayer, and to consider the means for the orphans' support. Saved to develop into noble, true-hearted Christian men and women, these waifs, no longer ragged, ignorant and terrorized, but educated and able to face the world, will go forth to become self-supporting workers and missionaries in their turn. Thus every dollar and every dime that was given to the orphan work in Armenia is doubly blessed.

The Bible Study Congress at Buffalo, N. Y., begins its sessions on July 17, and will continue until July 31. They are to be held in the City Convention Hall, Virginia street and Elmwood avenue, at 9:30 A.M. and 1 P.M. each day. Among the leaders are Dr. C. R. Blackall, of Philadelphia; Prof. F. K. Sanders, of Yale; Dr. James Morrow, of Philadelphia; Dr. J. W. Weddell, of Davenport, Ia.; Principal Elson I. Rexford, B.A., of Montreal; Dr. William R. Harper, of Chicago; Inspector James L. Hughes, of Toronto, and Dr. Wilbert W. White, of Montclair, N. J.

The Difficulty of Reformation

AMONG the most discouraging experiences we ever know are those which surround us when we try to reform people who have gone wrong. A lady takes into her employment a person whom she knows to have been a thief or a drunkard. She so arranges her work and manages her house that the temptations to wrong-doing are minimized. She treats the woman with considerate kindness, and in every possible way throws about her the safeguard of a Christian home. All in vain. The woman who has behind her the record of dishonesty cannot resist the greed of avarice; her fingers clutch the bit of coin or the pretty ornament which is not hers. Once embarked on a course of pilfering, the temptation is apparently almost irresistible to return to it. Equally is this the case with inebriety. Alcoholism weakens resistance, and the cells of the brain gape for the degrading stimulant. "I have made my final attempt," said a charitable woman last week. "Henceforth city missionaries and philanthropists need not appeal to me. I shall not turn my home into a moral sanitarium for such people as have disappointed me for the last five years. I am all tired out. Here is Mina, whom I supposed cured, lying in her bed in a state of disgusting intoxication, and her work and mine are all to do over again."

"Her work, yes, and mine." There was the key to the whole situation, except that there was One more to think of, even God. For, unless he also take a hand, nobody is ever reformed.

Difficult as it is for the employer, the burden on the sinner's self is heavier still, and the way of the transgressor remains proverbially hard. A sweet gentlewoman of my acquaintance kept in her house, as cook, a woman who for ten years, struggled periodically with the demon of drink. She had her three or four months of sobriety, when she was the most capable of willing workers, and the most quiet and respectful of servants. Then, without warning, without other danger signal than a certain odd restlessness and irritability, would come an outbreak, when the woman was a fiend, violent, profane, hysterical, beside herself with rage and fury. For ten years, the struggle went on; the lovely Christian woman helping her sister woman to conquer the evil spirit, and, by Christ's help, succeeding in the end. We must never allow ourselves to despair of any soul for whom Christ died. Our blessed living Redeemer is able to save, able to pardon, able to uplift any, however hardened, however wilful, who will truly repent, and come to him for salvation.

But more and more the word is borne in upon us, to save the children. Feed my lambs, is the commandment spoken to every disciple. Before the world, the flesh and the devil have their chance, let Christ's followers go out and rescue the dear little ones. Every child saved from Satan's dominion is heaven's prize. Before vice lays on the child its stain, before shame has crept over its innocence, before evil appetites have fettered the will, let us win the children for Christ, who is their and our everlasting Redeemer.

Sabbath-Keeping Away from Home

People who are punctilious about Sabbath-keeping when at home sometimes indulge in a good deal of license when among strangers. But if it is right to attend church when we are where everybody knows us and our families, it is equally right to do so among those to whom we may unconsciously set a good example. The very prevalent license of the day is leading Christian people astray. Men who once were most rigid in their observance of the Sabbath as "a day of rest and gladness" now infringe upon it for business purposes, traveling all day on Sunday that they may reach an objective point on Monday, and, on the pretext of healthful exercise, play golf on Sunday afternoon, a thing which would have made their fathers' hair to stand on end with horror. Do not break down the ancient barriers, nor remove the ancient landmarks.

The Fourth Commandment has never been repealed by him who gave it as his high behest. And if we obey it at all, we must obey it everywhere.

Discourtesy as a Ground for Divorce

In several recent instances, the principal cause publicly revealed as a cause for the dissolution of marriage bonds, appears to have been persistent discourtesy on the side of the husband. The parties seeking divorce were of the most fashionable and therefore among the

To the Discouraged Woman

DEAR FRIEND:—I don't know where you are, nor why you are discouraged, but I am sure this ought to go to you, for all this day you have been in my mind, and I have a message for you. I have reached a place in life where joy has flown out of the window, don't shut the window. Leave it open and joy will come back. It is very vexing to live with home folk who do not appreciate what you do, with sisters-in-law who are critical, and with aged people who are querulous, but if you keep right on, doing the best you can every day, and not minding little pinpricks and trials, some day you will find out that they love you and are proud of you. Mary Byington, a friend of mine, lived with her husband's mother, who was always complaining of Mary's housekeeping, and saying that she was not considerate of her children by her indulgence. At last, perfectly worn out, Mary was taken ill and nearly died. It was one of those long, depressing fevers which leave you so weak that you get your strength back by very few degrees, and feel as limp as a rag in your early convalescence. Mary's mother-in-law took the most tender care of her through the whole time of fever and of tedious getting well. Her own mother could not have been kinder. One day a neighbor called and was going away, and you know how acute your hearing is when you have been ill, Mary heard the older Mrs. John Byington say distinctly, "We have been very anxious, Mary is such a wonderful woman, such a perfect wife, such a devoted mother, it did not seem as if we could give her up. I have never prayed in my life, as I've prayed for the Lord to let Mary stay with us." There spoke the lady's real opinion, and it did Mary more good than medicine.

Do not let yourself stay in the valley of loneliness. The Lord never meant you to grovel in its depths. He wants you to be cheerful even when you cannot be very lighthearted. I have often wondered when I was most discouraged and things were going all wrong, that around the corner there was a beautiful surprise waiting for me. And I never had anything happen to me that on the surface looked trying, that I didn't find, at the core was the very best experience I had ever dreamed of.

It isn't worth while to fret, dear,
To walk as behind a hearse,
No matter how vexing things may be,
They easily might be worse.

Please keep ever in mind that all our lives are planned by our Heavenly Father. Nothing that comes to any of us comes by chance. Each day is the Father's gracious gift. Each day we are held as in the hollow of his loving hand. Let us cling the closer when the storms beat, and trust more firmly when we feel our weakness most.

It may not be my way, it may not be thy way,
But yet in his own way, the Lord will provide.

So, Sister Downcast, arise from the ash, and be Sister Sunbeam for the rest of the day. Here endeth this letter. AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON.

Sunday School Excursions

Every teacher should keep a bright outlook on a Sunday School excursion, that one of her restless little class drift into danger. As a rule, parents do not accompany the children on such occasions, and therefore the responsibility for safety and immunity from risk rests upon the teachers. Little boys are very daring, and are will o' the wisps away, so that when the excursion is over, and every child safely dismissed to its home, the caretakers may well be relieved. Fortunately, large Sunday School picnics, except to adjacent groves, are not now in vogue, and a better plan is found by those teachers, who take a small group at a time to the beach or the park for a few hours in the afternoon.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—JACK. If you love the young woman, ask her to let you see her, that is, if you are in a position to support her. Marriage with no settled income is an unsafe experiment.

—STUDENT. The best way to acquire a good French accent is to live where French is spoken. Why not board for the next year in a French family?

—AUNT SUE. Black is very sombre for constant wear. Why not vary it with gray, white and lavender? This is young for a woman in perfect health. You speak as if you were seventy.

—MINNIE AND GRACE. With a stage load of older people in front and another in the rear, I can see no harm in being a wagon load of girls and boys having their fun in the middle, on the way to the picnic.

OUR LITTLE "NORTH" AND "SOUTH"

"WE'RE glad we are Americans—
Upon the glorious Fourth.
I am a little Southern girl,
My cousin's from the North.

"We play that we are children
Of a-many years ago,
To call on General Washington,
Right merrily we go."

Then, lo! they mix their history up,
And talk of Grant and Lee—
"They were such nice, fine gentlemen,
And good friends, don't you see?"

Says South, "Lee gave his sword to Grant—
He must have loved him so."
Says North, "Our Grant loved Lee so much—
He wouldn't take it, though."

"We'll call on General Washington,
And then on Grant and Lee—
And then, O dear! we'd most forgot—
Our Lincoln we must see.

"'Twould never do to leave him out—
He was so great and good."
And so, they trip to make play-calls
In patriotic mood.

Ah, could the spirits of the past
Receive them as they come,
And see how faith and love survive,
And all discords are dumb.

How generals and presidents
Would greet this North and South—
Of jocund step and clapping hand,
And love-words in the mouth.

most widely known people in the land, residents of Newport and other elegant resorts. They were rich, well-educated, and accustomed to good society. Yet they seem to have been utterly ignorant of the requirements of ordinary politeness. An alarming tendency of the period is the increase of divorce in the classes who should be most refined and self-respecting, and who have most at stake in the matter of property and inheritance. Poor people, day-laborers, and the great mass who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, do not air their quarrels in print, nor invoke the aid of the courts to sever a relation which should be for life.

But there is a suggestion for most of us in the fact that marital happiness or misery may depend upon the practice in little things of the golden rule.

BEGINNING OF SIN AND REDEMPTION

* A BRUISED CONQUEROR *

...BY...
DR. AND MRS.
WILBUR F. CRAFTS

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 14. GEN. 3:1-5.

GOLDEN TEXT--WHERE SIN ABOUNDED, GRACE DID MUCH MORE ABOUND. ROM. 5: 20.

Man is the child of God by nature. He is ignorant and rebellious—the prodigal child of God; but his ignorance and rebellion never break that first relationship. To reassert the fatherhood and childhood as an unlost truth, and to reestablish its power as the central fact of life; to tell men that they were, and to make them actually be, the sons of God—that was the purpose of the coming of Jesus, and the shaping power of his life.

PHILLIPS BROOKS.

As trained teachers begin their lessons in geography with the child's own dooryard, so this lesson on sin should begin in our own hearts. We shall be ready to study the "Paradise lost" of Adam when we have viewed our own lost Eden of innocence. Inasmuch as our sinful hearts incline us to use the word "sin" in a sense far too narrow, definition should be the first step of all. "Sin is any want of conformity to, or transgression of, the will of God." This definition of the Westminster Catechism is complete. Whenever any one does what is wrong (John 3: 4), or fails to do what is duty (Jas. 1: 17), whether willfully or ignorantly, he has sinned, and needs the noble prayer: "Keep back thy servant from presumptuous [i]s, willful] sins, and cleanse thou me from unknown [i]s" (Psa. 51). That sinful tendencies are inherited is now taught by science, echoing Scripture and theology. Heredity arms us that as we yield to evil habits and tempers we are "giving iniquities upon the third and fourth generation" of our children's children. Here is child predisposed to drink; another, stung by bent to greed; another who is dragged downward by inherited lust. Too much time has been spent in debating whether he who possesses these sinful tendencies of "original" or "inbred sin" is really blameworthy for having them, or only for yielding to them. If there were any one, say Christ, who had only been tempted, he never yielded to sin, the question must have some practical value. But every one to whom this lesson comes knows he has yielded to these sinful tendencies, and knows in the depths of conscience that he is, fault for doing so, that he was not compelled, in short, is not a helpless machine, but a sinful man.

Adding sin not only around us, but in us, it will be profitable for us to study its origin in this lesson, only let us not spoil our teaching on the shell of the cocoon—difficulties, the speculations about what must, could, would, or should have happened—but get at once at the milk and meat of the first gospel, long known as the "protogospel."

With God said ye shall not eat of any tree of the garden? It is not worth while to spend time in debating the exact location of the garden home of our first parents. But there is real importance in the Bible statement that two of the four rivers that flowed through Eden were the Tigris and the Euphrates, real historic rivers, suggesting that this is a real history, although we need not deny that it may be profitable to those who regard it as "idealized history." It is reasonable to suppose that what are now the northern shores of the Persian Gulf must once have been rivers, as suggested in the old chart of Bochart.

The grandest thing in the garden was not precious stones and its stately palms, but human freedom. In the "mineral kingdom" no stone or tree could choose to be other than it was. And in the "animal kingdom" the beasts had little, if any, real power of choice. But man, who really belongs not to the "animal kingdom," as we have been wrongly taught, but, though his higher faculties, to the spiritual kingdom, with God and angels, by right of freedom and spiritual capacities, could not achieve so high a character without liberty. God could make a machine that could not choose to do evil rather than good, but he could not so make a man.

Adam and Eve, as grown-up children, were taught obedience, that is, the right use of liberty, by the object-lesson method. They were told they could eat of every tree of the garden save one. Many suppose that was an apple tree, but the Bible gives no slightest hint that it was. Any fruit tree would serve the purpose. They must learn to obey by practice. What is obedience? Not to eat of the reserved or forbidden tree. What is disobedience? To eat of it. Just that simple way it would become a "tree of knowledge of good and evil." In a precisely similar way a wise parent taught obedience to his baby girl, not yet two years old, who was disposed to soil herself playing in a water-pail on a low bench. Instead of removing it, the wise parents determined to make it to the child the "tree of knowledge of good and evil." Whenever the child touched the water-pail there were signs and words of disapproval, sometimes a snap of the fingers also. When the child was two years old she was told to hear her papa preach, and made the following report to her mother: "He p'each, an' he p'each—an' he tell 'e p'oles 'ey mus' be good chilluns—an'—not play in 'e water-pail." God does not say to us of any tree, "Thou shalt not eat of it," but he does say, Thou shalt not worship any God but me, Thou shalt not swear. Thou shalt do no work on the Sabbath Day. Thou shalt not dishonor thy father and mother. Thou shalt do no murder. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not tell lies about others. Thou shalt not covet. That God should allow evil is the fundamental mystery, and we find that is essential to freedom. It is only another aspect of the mystery that he should allow the "Evil One" to tempt man to use his freedom to do wrong. Many have argued that the devil is only an angel sent to test and develop character. Moulton urges this conception of the Satan of Job, who, he notes, came as one of the "Sons of God."

Dr. Holland's "Bitter Sweet" sets that theory to music:

Evil is only the slave of good,
Sorrow the servant of joy,
And the soul is mad that refuses food
From the meaneast in God's employ

But the plain teachings of the Bible seems to us to be that in the exercise of freedom, shared with man by angels, one of their chiefs fell from heaven to hell—perhaps through pride and ambition—and that this Satan, with other fallen angels, seeks to bring men also under his sway by drawing them away from God.

Our lesson story represents him as coming to the garden of Eden embodied in a serpent, against which no prejudice then existed, and suggesting doubts of God's goodness: "Is it possible God has said you may not eat of any of the trees of the garden?" Eve defended God as having reserved only one tree. After a little parleying, the "Father of lies" grew bold enough to deny the first revelation God made to man, the declaration that disobedience would lead to death. The Devil declared, "Ye shall not surely die." Why should any one doubt the Devil said that when he is saying every day that God is too good to punish anybody, and that wickedness is the way to "see life," to know good and evil for ourselves, regardless of the Bible? Here is the root of rationalism in the very garden of Eden, not native but transplanted from without. Eve was the first rationalist, seeking to be independent of revelation in knowing good and evil by her large and strong, but it was agreed to let the worm complete his work. The next summer the leaves of the tree dropped off very early, and the next year the tree was a dead, rotten thing, and the hole made by the worm was found to have penetrated its very heart. Almost every one is already thinking of some strong and gifted youth thus killed, body and soul, by some one sin that he allowed to eat into his heart, or some forbidden fruit of gambling, or lust, or drink, or greed that he would eat in spite of the warnings of God and man. He may not yet be buried, but perhaps walks the earth a living corpse, despised by others, and most of all by himself. Permitted joys grow like abundant fruit trees on every side. God save us from the folly of turning aside to the few deadly pleasures he has forbidden, all of them apples of Sodom, attractive to look upon, and, even for the moment, to the taste, but ashes of remorse in memory forever and ever. Rev. J. Munro Gibson, D.D., defines sin as "the gratification of present desire, regardless of law and right."

own instincts. We can not rely on instincts in which the wish is father to the thought. This lesson proclaims both the Tempter and the Redeemer.

And the man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord. Thus did they confess the death that had come upon their souls. No one familiar with geology will think of physical death as the consequence of sin. The oldest rocks are the tombs of myriads of once living creatures. A child may easily fall into the error of thinking God did not keep his threat in that Adam and Eve did not fall dead in the very act of eating the forbidden fruit. But death of soul is always the worst death. The mother whose innocent babe has gone to heaven has a lesser sorrow than the mother whose boy is dead to truth and purity and honor, and tries in vain to hide his real character from her pure eyes as Adam and Eve in their guilt sought in vain to hide from God. We can not do anything behind God's back. In our secret sins we hear his cry echoing in the chambers of conscience, "Where art thou?"

How a Soul Dies

If an unforgiven sinner were admitted to the presence of God he would be afraid of the face of God, and call for rocks and hills where he might hide from the burning gaze of his purity. As physical death is the separation of the soul from the body, spiritual death is the separation of the soul from God. Life and death, hell and heaven are all dependent on character. "Whosoever liveth and believeth shall never die." One day a naturalist walking through a park with several companions noticed a blackheaded woodworm about three inches long working its way under the bark of a tree, which was then as healthy as any in the park. "Let the worm alone," said the naturalist, "and it will kill the tree." It seemed incredible that so small a worm could kill a tree so all reckoned from the father, it is at least significant that the promised Saviour was to be "the seed of the woman," and yet more that he who was to bruise the serpent was to do it at the cost of his own bruising. The wounded heart and brow of Christ were to be foretold later, but here in the first day of man's sin we behold the feet that were nailed to the cross, with a hint of the kingly inscription that was to hang above his head. From the first he was foretold as a bruised Conqueror.

One Sin May Kill a Soul

When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, under the law, "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil" (Gal. 4: 4, 14). "As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. 5: 19).

But we, too, are the "seed of the woman," the new spiritual Israel, the Christ's, as the Germans say, and must do our part in defeating the Devil's efforts to capture the world. First in our own souls and those of our families we must conquer revenge, hatred, envy, greed and every evil temper and habit. Shakespeare, in "As You Like It," tells of Orlando wandering through the forest of Arden and seeing his brother Oliver, who had cruelly wronged him, lying asleep under a tree with a poisonous snake coiled about his neck and a crouching lion ready to spring upon him. Orlando, at the peril of his life, rescued his offending brother, thus subduing his brother's hatred and winning his love. Thus may we, too, bruise the serpent's head by destroying revenge.

Fear not ye, for I am throned above the angry water-floods, Compassionate because Omnipotent, patient because Eternal.

BICKERSTETH: Yesterday, To-day, and Forever.

PEACE CAME AT THE ALTAR

Now Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Became a Christian
BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

ONE of the most popular and beloved ministers in the South, is Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald, of Nashville, Tennessee. He is a great-hearted, genial, picturesque man, who always wins his way everywhere he goes, by that whole-hearted humanness with appeals to men in every country and clime. Bishop Fitzgerald has given me the story of the beginning of his Christian life, in such a unique and striking way, that I think I cannot do better than give it far as possible in his own language. "I came into the Church," said the Bishop, "when two days old—that is to say, I was then dedicated to God in baptism. Dr. Abram Penn, of the Virginia Conference, was the administrator. After speaking on my head the crystal drops, he knelt at the bedside and prayed that I might live before the Lord; that I might be a disciple of Jesus; and that I might become a Methodist preacher. 'I felt the answer,' said my mother to me, with wet eyes, and in a low voice that I seem to hear now as I write the words.

She felt the answer—and so have I, all my life. Christians used to talk that way in those days concerning prayer. They believed that the prayer of faith to the God, and that God does and can do for the suppliant, and the subject of the prayer at the same moment. The Old Book seems to put it this way. Many Christians reach this level many times in their lives. It is a high plane; up there the air is very pure and the light is clear and strong. My mother had that sort of faith. According to her faith, it was done unto her. She lived to know that the child she gave to God in the baptismal covenant was a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. My dear Christian mother! She would be so wonderfully beautiful in her youth. To me she was always beautiful. She was a woman of many sorrows. The last time I saw her the marks of age and pain and grief were on her face. I still see her again, clothed in beauty greater than that of her bridal morning, upon a hill in that land where the weary rest. She was a sweet singer—and her songs were mostly in the minor key. She had sorrows of her own, and was touched by all the sorrows of the circles in which she moved, from the highest to the lowest.

She ministered to all, and was loved by all. These many years she has been with in the vale. I shall know her when we meet, and the rest of the city of God will be complete, when once more I feel the clasp of her arms.

"Yes, I thus came into the church when two days old, and the tie was never wholly broken. In a brighter day that is coming, there will be a fuller perception of the meaning of the Master's words: 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' My mother felt the answer to her prayer of faith at my baptism. I feel it now. The church of Christ has kept her arms around me all my life, never withdrawing them for a moment.

"My conversion came in God's own good way and time in the city of Macon, Georgia. An attack of typhoid fever was the turning point. I was a stranger, and at a hotel. The negro boy, Albert, who waited upon me, saved my life. The doctors had given me up to die. I heard them say to Albert, 'Give him anything he asks for.' I made it known to him that I wanted ice-water, and it was brought—a pitcherful, cold as it could be. I drank, and drank, and drank! I felt the coolness to my very finger-tips, and said to myself inwardly, 'I will get well'—and so I did. It was the ice-water that did it. The surprised doctors postponed the funeral they had expected. I came out of the jaws of death, and by slow degrees strength came back to me. I had time to think and pray, to look at my past life, and to ponder the paths of my feet. That robust yet tender pastor, Dr. James E. Evans—a great man in his day, whose mighty passion for saving souls would often vent itself in sobs and tears in agony over lost sinners—was stirring all Macon at this time by a powerful revival, awakened under his preaching. The revival wave struck me just when I was ready for it. On my sick-bed, and during my convalescence, the Holy Spirit had spoken to my soul the things that made for my peace, because I was quiet enough to listen. I thought on my ways and turned my feet to the testimonies of God with a solemn earnestness born of reflection, and under the leading of the Holy Spirit that had followed me and striven with me all my life. As soon as I was able to go to the meetings, I yielded to the call of the Spirit. Kneeling at the chancel with others, one night, a night never to be forgotten, amid prayers and holy songs suited to the hour, Dr. William H. Ellison bent above me and softly spoke to me some words that helped me then and there to give myself wholly to the Lord—to choose Christ as my Saviour, with a purpose to follow him as long as I lived. There was no reserve in my consecration, and no doubt as to my acceptance. The peace of God flowed into my soul; I felt the blessedness of a conscious salvation. The experience was unspeakably solemn and sweet. Yes, thank God, it is unspeakably solemn and sweet, for I feel it now as I felt it then! It is the same in its essence, but—let me write it with humility and adoring thankfulness—it is fuller and deeper after the lapse of the years between the early fifties and this, the first year of the new century.

"This was my conversion. The initiated reader knows what it is; the uninitiated may know. 'Whosoever will may take of the water of life'—and he may do so now."

Missionary Hearts Gladdened

The Great International Missionary Gathering at Clifton Springs Cordially Endorses Our Famine Relief Work in China

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON SECOND PAGE OF THIS ISSUE

THE International Missionary Union recently closed its eighteenth annual meeting at Clifton Springs, New York. The whole week, June 5 to 12 inclusive, was one of great privilege to the 156 missionaries and to the other Christian workers present. While nearly every mission field and mission board was represented, China naturally occupied the foremost place. About forty missionaries from China were present, half of whom will soon return with joy to their work.

Dr. J. Howard Taylor, son of Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission, gave a sketch of the relation of the famine to the recent outbreaks. Now, as the need of the famine district becomes more apparent, there is an opportunity for the Christian world to prove the falsity of the charges against foreigners.

Mrs. Taylor drew attention to the fact that the present famine threatens to be as severe as that of twenty years ago, and as that famine gave to the Church one of its best native workers, so this time, if the churches at home make efficient their love for the people.

Dr. Edna G. Terry, Rev. F. D. Gamewell, and Rev. J. L. Whiting, who were the siege of Peking, told of the series of evidences by which God had miraculously cared for their great company. They bore testimony to the consciousness they had during their weeks of peril, that they were being upheld by the prayers of friends in the home land. Mr. Whiting said: "Let there be a definiteness in your prayers for China. Present continually to God the great crisis in China, and pray for those who are negotiating for peace.

No less thrilling was the account of the flight from Kalgan across the desert of Gobi, twelve hundred miles to Siberia, as the delegates heard it from Rev. W. P. Sprague, Rev. Mark Williams and Dr. Virginia Murdock. Mr. Dreyer told of his flight from Ku Hu with ten ladies, two children and a sick man, forty-five days' journey through a perilous country, where many suffered martyrdom. Both children died, and were buried on the way. A pathetic interest gathered around the address of Mrs. George L. Williams, for her husband was one of the martyrs of Shansi, while she, with three little children, was in the home land.

One of the youngest missionaries present who, after only three years' work, had been spared to return to America, said that her first thought had been, "Did not my Saviour count me worthy to suffer martyrdom for his sake?" but he had shown her that she might yet labor for him, and she is rejoicing to be able to return to China.

The fidelity of the native Christians, their martyrdoms, and their present needs called forth prayer and loving tributes. The Union expressed its appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Famine Relief Work by the following resolution:

"The International Missionary Union, assembled at Clifton Springs, N. Y., June 11, 1901, with representatives of all Protestant missions, and all foreign fields, has heard with great pleasure of the prompt response made by Mr. Louis Klopsch and his associates of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the call for relief for the famine sufferers in the Shansi province in north China. We are glad to know that many contributions are pouring in, and that the list of contributors includes the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, as well as Christian people of every rank in life and of all denominations. We express our hearty thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and ask the good people of all the churches to forward liberal contributions. We believe that this is the best and most effective answer for Christian people to make to the inhumanities of the Boxers in that province; and we are glad to be strengthened in that faith by the testimony of the widows of our brethren who fell, who have expressed their hearty sympathy with this movement for famine relief. We bear cordial witness to the judicious course of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in appointing the Rev. Messrs. Arthur H. Smith, H. H. Lowry, M. B. Duncan, E. H. Edwards, M. B., and I. J. Atwood, M.D., as the committee to administer the funds subscribed."

India had nearly as many missionaries as China at the meeting. Japan came next in numbers, and among the fifty-nine returning to their work, were representatives from Africa, Bulgaria, Burma, Korea, Laos, Micronesia, Mexico, and Turkey.

INDIVIDUAL WORK*

The Duty of Preaching Incumbent on Every Christian

ONE of the most remarkable characteristics of Christ's life, as it is reported in the Gospels, is the number of his conversations with individuals. Apparently, he did not consider time wasted which he spent in talking to a single auditor, as to Nicodemus and the woman of Samaria. It would be well if his people followed his example in this respect. The opportunity of preaching to a large congregation comes to comparatively few, but all can reach one or two persons. We never know how important the result may be. The Methodist minister in England, whose sermon was the means of leading Pastor C. H. Spurgeon to Christ, did a better service to his generation than if he had won the whole congregation instead of at one convert. Thousands of souls scattered all over the world have reason to thank that Spurgeon entered that church that morning and heard the message which carried the light into his soul. We can tell whether there may be near us some young man who, if enlightened, might become such an effective worker in Christ's cause? The history of the Church shows that many of our most successful workers have been enlisted in unexpected ways, and by very humble efforts. It might be that the kindly appeal, the personal testimony which every one can use, might be just as influential in the coming year as was that Methodist minister's sermon.

Philip appears to have been a successful preacher. The work in which he had been engaged had produced what in these days would be called a revival. But he has bidden leave it and preach to a sinner here. In that, too, he was successful. We do not know what his conversion did afterwards, but it would appear that the one soul so saved, was deemed by the power which directed the preacher, of sufficient importance to justify the employment of such a messenger. That was no question for Philip to consider. He received the command and obeyed it. Is it possible that such a command may have come to us and we have failed to heed it? Peter was enlisted in that way. "I drew first nigh to his own brother Simon" (John 1:42). The apostle Philip did similar service for Nathanael. If the Christians of our day were to have the same zeal, how speedily the number of Christ's followers might be doubled! There are very few who have not influenced, over some brother, or friend, or business acquaintance, and might use it with power. The impression is too common that Christ's command to preach the Gospel every creature was addressed to the professional preacher only. But experience proves that whosoever will, may engage in the work and have a share in the blessing. There is too much reticence among us, too little perception of duty in this matter. The ordination of the ministers on every one, and in the very last of Christ's messages to the Church, the command is given to fulfill that ordination. "I him that heareth," or who has heard for himself, "say, come," not only in devotion to Christ, but to his neighbors. There are many reasons why such individual efforts may be successful. One of them is that they are disinterested. There are some people who look with suspicion on the efforts of the professional preacher. "It is his business," they say, and they turn away with the idea that the preacher is perfunctorily engaged in his business. No suspicion of that kind can be cherished, when a man who has obviously nothing to gain, urges his friend to unite with Christ. Then, too, such appeals have the mighty force of personal testimony. The man who resists an elaborate argument, who is not impressed by a carefully prepared logical appeal, is liable to be moved by the simple statement that his friend has tried this religion for himself and has found it a help and a blessing to him. There is often a shrinking from the duty of speaking about religion to a brother or a friend. The Sunday School teacher who can speak freely enough to the boys in his class, finds it hard to speak to his brother, or his friend. Yet his silence may be positively injurious. The inference may be drawn from it that the professing Christian is not sincere. "Why does he not speak to me?" his unconverted friend may ask. "If he were in possession of some financial secret, if he knew of a remedy for some disease that was sapping my life, he would be eager to tell me. If religion really meant as much to him as he professes, he would surely speak." So Christ may be wounded in the house of his friends, and the message which would come with force and effect is not spoken. There are such cases, and the continued reticence, which an effort might break, goes on until the opportunity is lost forever.

THE FIRST HUMAN SIN

Listening to the Tempter the Way to Loss of Innocence

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN sin ceases, death will cease also (Rev. 21:4). Through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin, and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned" (Rom. 5:12). There was but one way by which Satan could do harm to Adam and Eve: if he could induce them to sin, then he had power to injure them; if he could sow in their hearts distrust of God, he would have them in his power. They were created in the image of God; we do not learn that he was thus created. Satan was created very beautiful, very wise; but he fell through pride and self-exaltation (Ezek. 28:12-18). Man was created in the image of God—peculiarly akin to his Maker. From his very origin he was so associated with God that he could not act independently; what he is and what he does must touch God in a way that is not the case with other created beings.

Probably Satan was created with a free will, just as man was afterwards; and wherever there is free will, there is the possibility of self-consciousness. Satan approached, not the man, but the woman, with his subtle question, "Hath God said, Ye shall not eat of any tree of the garden?" Up to this time, no other than God himself had ever held any communication with Adam and Eve. But God had given them dominion over the whole creation, and demanded from them obedience on one point—that they should neither eat of nor touch the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. And it was on this point—the only one on which God had called for obedience—that the tempter came to assail the woman. Did she fully realize her position? She was answerable to God, not to the serpent. As one who had dominion, held under God, she must learn from him, but not from the creature over which she was to rule. She could not listen to a creature without getting into wrong relations with God.

How often have we sinned for the same reason! Without considering from whence came some question or suggestion, without considering whether God would have us undertake to answer it or not, we have admitted it, and only seen our mistake when we have been caught in the enemy's trap. The question of the tempter was one which concerned God; and had the woman at once taken it to God, without herself giving any answer to the serpent, she would not have fallen. But she fell into the snare, admitted the awful possibility into her mind that God could have made a mistake; that he could have done better; and her confidence in him gave way. She began to think, not of what he willed, but of what she willed; not of his command, and of his just and true authority over her, but of what would please her. And already, before the deed was done—already, as soon as she had ceased to trust God as all-holy, all-wise, all-good, Eve had fallen.

When her confidence was unshaken in the perfect wisdom of God, she was satisfied; but now she desired a wisdom apart from God, and believed the Devil's lie that the knowledge of good and evil would make her like God. It had been his own temptation: God says to him, "Thou saidst in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; and I will sit upon the mount of the congregation, in the uttermost parts of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the Most High" (Isa. 14:13, 14); and in his hatred of God and jealousy of men, he sought to drag Adam and Eve into a fall similar to his own. Poor fallen Eve fell into the snare. When she saw "that the tree was to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and she gave also to her husband with her, and he did eat." And man fell; God's image was defaced, and Satan has written only too clearly his lineaments on man's face and form, heart and character.

But God's purpose for man was not abandoned; it was only postponed in its accomplishment. Man had left God, but God had not man. In a way they had not expected, the knowledge of evil had begun to work. A clear conscience loves the light, for it has nothing to hide; a guilty conscience dreads the light, and Adam and Eve had procured this to themselves in the day of their fall, and, therefore, when they heard the sound of the Lord God, they hid. But he called unto the man, and said unto him: "Where art thou?" It is the first question God asked of man, and he asks it of every man still.

And what now? Did God abandon them? Did he destroy the earth and make it waste and void? It must come to this before sin and death are finally done away with (II. Peter 3:7, 12; Rev. 20:11), and "a new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" can be made (II. Peter 3:13). But the very day of the fall of man, God, who is Love as well as Justice, spoke of redemption. After declaring his curse upon the serpent, he said to him: "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." The Devil will not conquer in the long run, and we know now that he has been overcome by Christ, the Seed of the woman (Heb. 2:14), that he is Conqueror of both sin and death. He has not only provided atonement, but also victory, for all who believe in and obey him.

God has provided a redemption, we are a redeemed people, and through the redemption of Christ we can and may retrace the sad steps of our first parents' fall. Not only have we redemption through his blood, we are delivered from the present evil age (Gal. 1:4), and by his life ("Christ in you the Hope of glory," Col. 1:27) we are delivered from our life—the life which hides away from God, which has ceased to be upright and which makes excuses for sin. It is as Christ is formed in us, and we are conformed to his image, that we begin to recognize our true relations to God, and thus trust and confidence, ready and willing obedience are wrought in us. And we find that as, by the grace of God, he works thus in us, unquestioning obedience to him becomes more and more a delight, as it was to our Lord. Thus his redemption covers all the ground of the fall "to every one that believeth."

Questions of the Week

1. In what way does a traveler, in going east or west, gain or lose time?

The earth turns from west to east fifteen degrees, or about one thousand miles an hour. When the sun is on any given meridian it is noon there; a line fifteen degrees to the west must wait an hour for the earth's revolution to bring it vertical to the sun; a line fifteen degrees to the east had noon an hour previous. Let a traveler go from Chicago to New York, one thousand miles apart, his watch set by Chicago time. He finds on arriving at the eastern metropolis, six o'clock A.M., local time, that it is only five o'clock by his watch, which, in regulating, he turns ahead, and thus gains an hour. Returning to Chicago, his watch now showing New York time, he notes that while the Chicago chronometer indicates eleven o'clock, it is twelve o'clock by his own time-piece. Accordingly, he sets his watch back, and this time loses an hour. MRS. M. A. HOYT.

2. What is the smallest known religious sect (in point of numbers) in the world?

The Samaritans have been reduced to one hundred and fifty members. In Baedeker's Palestine and Syria edition of 1876, I find: "In the twelfth century, Benjamin Tudela found about 1,000 adherents of the sect of the Samaritans at Nablus, and a few at Ascalon, Caesarea and Damascus. For some years past they have been confined to Nablus, although they formerly had small communities at Cairo and Damascus. Their numbers are steadily diminishing, now consisting of forty to fifty families only, who live in a distinct quarter of the town (S. W.)." In 1887, the writer was in their synagogue, and saw their ancient manuscript of the Pentateuch, said to have been written by the grandson of Aaron 3,472 years ago. McClintock and Strong, in 1880, placed the total census of the Samaritans at 130. JOHN D. KNOX.

3. What is the duty of a pastor toward a young woman who contemplates marriage with a dissipated man, when the pastor knows his character, but she does not, and has no means of making the discovery? In such case what should a minister do?

The pastor is in a difficult and delicate position. It is probable that the man in question has either temporarily reformed, or is making an effort to do so, otherwise the girl herself could not fail to have discovered his real character. In that case, the pastor might, by interfering and causing the breaking of the engagement, cause the young man to fall back into his evil ways. He would also lay himself open to an action for slander, and in any case arouse the suitor's indignation to an extent that might endanger his own usefulness in the community. It is doubtful, too, whether he would do any good. The girl would believe that her lover was being falsely accused and would champion his cause against the minister.

If the girl has a father, or a brother, or a male guardian, the pastor had better put the matter in his hands, at the same time furnishing him with evidence that will permit him to investigate for himself. Only in an extreme case, and when there are no other ways of putting the girl on her guard, should the pastor take the responsibility of denouncing her lover to her. C. C. CRAWFORD.

The minister should do as any other well disposed man would under the circumstances—should acquaint the lady with the character of the man, and should try to make it possible for her to see for herself the danger she is approaching. In order to make his attempt to save her effectual, he should find out the best means of imparting the information. In case his acquaintance with her is very intimate and his influence great, he should personally impart the information and seek to persuade her to change her intentions. If he feels that he himself is not competent to perform the task, he should furnish the information to her friends, and urge them to use their influence with her. The question to be considered is not whether he can succeed in his efforts or whether he will render himself obnoxious to any one through them, but how he may most faithfully do his duty. L. T. RIGHTSELL.

4. When license has been voted by the people, can the town council, a majority of whom are Christian men, consistently grant the license to sell liquor? Should these men resign, and let the people elect other men to take their places, or should they refuse the license, and incur the penalty for withholding it?

They certainly can consistently grant the license. In a free Democracy no executive officers have a right to defeat a legal demand of the majority. The council have no right to resign, and perhaps allow their positions to be filled with men of no moral character or responsibility, under whom the liquor business would have unbridled liberty. If the licenses for the saloons. Prohibition, with the people in favor of it, is a grand success, but enforced prohibition, against and contrary to the will of the majority, is sure failure. WALTER W. HUBBARD.

5. Which of the famous Americans who have lived since the Revolution left the record that you would most like to have at the end of your own life?

I can imagine no more sublime ending of earthly life than to have it said of me, as it was of Abraham Lincoln, that I was the instrument by which four million souls obtained liberty. I can fancy no more honor, than to be endowed with wisdom, and so touched with dramatic fire, as to enable me to teach souls the meaning of liberty, and what Christ meant when he said, "I am the life, the truth, and the way." The sound of the clanking shackles dropping from the colored race had scarcely died away, when man realized as never before that slavery in many forms still existed, and belonged not to one color, race, or nation. The slavery of intemperance, impurity, and selfishness, which has its chains fastened upon thousands of helpless victims, and has its record as black as any recorded during the slavery of the colored people. I should like to issue the second Emancipation Proclamation, to thousands of the fathers and mothers of this land, teaching them that the child of a bondman is a slave also, and through them living as free men and women, this old world can be rescued for Christ. I should like to break the chains that are binding hundreds of our boys and young men to-ness usages. There is probably no field for the conduct of legitimate business enterprises than boards of trade, and business should not be confounded with cat speculations, swindling and gambling, to which no reputable dealer would give countenance.

The population of the United States, according to the Census revision just completed, is 76,303,387. This includes Alaska, Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines. The most densely populated section of the Union is Rhode Island.

Send either by draft, money order, or registered letter, made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

In the marriage hymn, "A New Hope for Jesus," by Alfred S. Dyer, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on May 1, the second line is rendered obscure by misprint. The verse should read:

Lord, on this sacred union,
Of heart to heart now joined,
Life's interests in communion,
May each thy blessing find;
May each in purpose holy,
In loyal life for thee,
In years for Jesus solely,
By oneness strengthened be.

W. D., Westport, Calif. Could you kindly inform me, as far as known, the different countries where leprosy is found?

The disease is common in Asia, Africa, South America, Hawaii and the West Indies, and a few isolated localities of Europe. In India there are 131,618 lepers; no other country has nearly so many. Sporadic cases of the disease are found in all countries, but as an endemic, it is chiefly confined to the Orient, where it originated, and whence it migrated West at various times. At the time of the crusades it grew to the proportions of an epidemic, and leper colonies now existing on the west coast of Norway, in the Baltic provinces of Russia, and a few other places, are regarded as survivals of the medieval outbreak.

A timely letter this, and one that might well be considered by lukewarm Christians. J. B. E., Chicago, Ill., writes:

have to be granted, as seems the case in the instance cited, far better that they be granted by men who will use positive efforts to prevent such licenses going to the lowest element in the community. Neither have they the right to refuse such license, such refusal being perjury in the true sense of the word. WM. W. CASE.

It is very hazardous to advise that the will of the people legally expressed, ought to be disregarded and ignored, even though that sentiment is unworthy of a Christian community and in ill accord with the principles of righteousness. Violation of the rights of the majority by officials in power cannot but fail to injure any cause of righteous reform, as such action is subversive of the very foundations of Republican government. It is the duty of a public servant who cannot conscientiously carry out the people's will and enforce the laws according to his sworn oath, to relinquish his position, and make public his reasons and convictions, endeavoring to create the greatest possible sentiment against the rum curse. To resign from office with this avowed purpose, and to absolutely refuse to be implicated to the least degree in the destructive business of drunkard-making, with its fearful ravages among even the innocent women and children, would probably help the cause of true temperance more in the long run than by continuing in office, and refusing to grant a liquor license, when the majority of the people at the polls expressed the desire day, teaching them, also, that the way to freedom is total abstinence from many existing evils, and I would not forget the chains that are fastened upon the girls, that chain that compels a girl to follow certain styles in dress, regardless of health and means. I should like to clothe them with the garment of liberty, which is the beautiful garment of Righteousness. Such a record would be worthy a place beside that of the illustrious Lincoln at least. MARY C. LEE.

Much, doubtless, depends upon the standpoint from which we view this question. But as for me, when earth shall be fading, and eternity opening, I know of no one whose record I would so like to have as that of Dwight L. Moody. He seems always to have had the same mind that was in Christ Jesus. Filled with the Holy Ghost, he so preached the Gospel that he was heard everywhere by the multitudes with gladness to their eternal salvation. Who would not covet such a record? "They who turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

THE ZIONIST MEDAL

OBVERSE OF MEDAL

THE COMING ZIONIST CONGRESS

THE fourth annual Convention of the Federation of American Zionists recently held in Philadelphia, revived public interest in the problem of Hebrew Colonization of Palestine, and fixed popular regard on a number of facts which show that the Zionist cause has made notable progress. Coming immediately after the Zionist night at the Maccabæans in London, where Dr. Herzl, the father of the Zionist movement, was greeted with such applause; where Zangwill made his wonderful speech, and Sir Francis Monifore and other distinguished Hebrews testified to their faith that the Zionist plan was practical as well as righteous, the Philadelphia Convention had strong stimulus for enthusiastic discussions and hopeful outlook. Dr. Herzl's letter of greeting, which was read, directed attention to the growth of the organization as shown in the calling of the several international congresses; the creation in different countries of Zionist societies, and their consolidation into national organizations; the introduction of the shekel tax, followed by the establishment of the Jewish Colonial Bank; when he spoke of ground gained in the attitude of the Turkish Government towards Zionist representatives. His utterances in the highest respect were the more significant in that Dr. Herzl was one of a deputation which, on May 17, had an audience with the Sultan, and it has been said, gave encouragement and belief that the Zionists can secure of the guarantees or concessions they have been seeking. In the address of Prof. Richard Gottheil, President of the Federation, note was taken of the fact that Zionist societies in South America have asked affiliation and that work is being extended to the Philippines, a society having been lately established in Manila. Delegates to the International Convention, which meets in London next fall, will be appointed later. A major resolution, but one of most interesting character, was that to arrange for an exhibit of the products of Palestine at future meetings. The American Federation of Zionists numbered more than one hundred and twenty-five societies, where, in 1897, there were merely a handful. In its development, it but repeats the history of the international organization. Before the Congress at Basle, in 1897, there were in the world something over one hundred societies whose aims were more or less Zionist; at the second Congress, in 1898, there were more than eight hundred. This photograph reproduces the Congress of 1899, one of Zionism, that wholesale emigration of the Jews to Palestine has never been contemplated, nor the establishment of a political State there. The purpose is rather to provide a "legally secured home" in the land of their forefathers for Jews living in countries where they are not happy. To this end, the idea has been to obtain guarantees and commercial concessions from the Sultan, securing the future of the Colonies, while promising in return good citizens, who will reclaim the waste places of said that the only thing needed to put this plan under way was two million pounds, a half million of which was already in the Jewish Colonial Trust in London. "What is one and a half million to the Jews?" asked Zangwill. But the millionaires have not yet lent aid to this movement. It is the poor children of Israel who, from the four quarters of the globe, have sent in their shekels.

There are now thirty or more Jewish colonies in Palestine, where, twenty years ago, there were but two. In Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and across the Jordan, we find them. Close to the Mediterranean, and not far from Haifa, is Zikron Yaakob, the largest and finest of them all with about 1,000 people, chiefly engaged in wheat-growing, breeding silkworms and bees, and raising vegetables. Near Joppa is Rishon-le-Zion, the first Russian-Jewish Colony, established 1882, now a most prosperous community. And so in various places in Palestine, Jewish refugees, driven from Russia, Roumania and elsewhere by persecution, have made the desert blossom like the rose. They had a hard struggle to do this. In some instances they worked the ground with their fingers, because they had no implements. By their industry and peaceableness they have commended themselves to neighbors and rulers. None of these colonies were established by the Zionists. The international association will not plant colonies until their future can be assured.

The coming Zionist Congress will doubtless be the most interesting ever held, and perhaps may inaugurate more active operations in the East than have been undertaken heretofore. It is not out of the range of possibilities that there may be laid before that body a colonization charter, together with guarantees from the Turkish Government, and certified articles from all Christian powers, permitting Zionists to make settlements in Palestine according to plans they have laid down. Certain it is that there will be an influential representation of American Hebrews at the international deliberations. Prof. Gottheil will, of course, be present. Dr. Wise, the able Oregonian, who was prominent in the Philadelphia Convention, may be a delegate for the West.

Many prominent Hebrews are opposed to Zionism, but intense antagonism seems on the wane. "Had you told me ten years ago," says Rabbi Gottheil, "that to-day I would be an ardent Zionist, I would not have believed you." But he is such, and it is his son, a professor in Columbia College, who leads Zionism here.

At the 1898 Congress, the souvenir medal struck bore on one side a symbolic figure, recalling wandering Jews to Palestine; on the other was this in Hebrew: "Behold, I will take the children of Israel from the nations and will bring them into their own land." That is the watchword of Zionism.

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

FOR CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR WEEK

...SERMON BY...

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT: Amos 9: 13:

BEHOLD THE DAYS COME, SAITH THE LORD, THAT THE PLOUGHMAN SHALL OVERTAKE THE REAPER

UNABLE because of other important duties to accept the invitation to take part in the great Convention of Christian Endeavorers at Cincinnati, begun last week, I preach a sermon of congratulation for all the members of that magnificent association, whether now gathered in vast assemblage, or busy in their places of usefulness, transatlantic and cisatlantic. And as it is now harvest-time in the fields, and sickles are flashing in the gathering of a great crop, I find mighty suggestiveness in my text.

It is a picture of a tropical clime, with a season so prosperous that the harvest reaches clear over to the planting time, and the swarthy husbandman, busy cutting the grain, almost feels the breath of the horses on his shoulders, the horses hitched to the plough, preparing for a new crop. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper." When is that? That is now. That is this day, when hardly have you done reaping one harvest of religious result, than the ploughman is getting ready for another.

In phraseology, charged with all venom and abuse and caricature, I know that infidels and agnostics have declared that Christianity has collapsed, that the Bible is an obsolete book, that the Christian Church is on the retreat. "I shall answer that wholesale charge to-day.

Between three and four million Endeavorers sworn before high heaven that they will do all they can to take America for God, Europe for God, Asia and Africa for God—are not the signs most cheering? Or to return to the agricultural figure of my text, more than a million reapers are overtaken by more than a million ploughmen. Besides this, there are more people who believe in the Bible than at any time in the world's existence. An Arab guide was leading a French infidel across the desert, and ever and anon the Arab guide would get down in the sand and pray to the Lord. It disgusted the French infidel, and after awhile, as the Arab got up from one of his prayers, the infidel said: "How do you know there is any God?" And the Arab guide said: "How do I know that a man and a camel passed by our tent last night? I know it by the footprint in the sand. And you want to know how I know whether there is any God? Look at the sunset. Is that the footprint of a man?" And by the same process you and I have come to understand that this book is the footstep of God.

The March Through the Centuries

But now let us see whether the Book is a last year's almanac. Let us see whether the Church of God is a Bull Run retreat, muskets, canteens and haversacks strewn all the way. The great English historian, Sharon Turner, a man of vast learning and great accuracy, not a clergyman, but an attorney as well as a historian, gives this overwhelming statistic in regard to Christianity and in regard to the number of Christians in the different centuries. In the first century, 500,000 Christians; in the second century, 2,000,000 Christians; in the third century, 5,000,000 Christians; in the fourth century, 10,000,000 Christians; in the fifth century, 15,000,000 Christians; in the sixth century, 20,000,000 Christians; in the seventh century, 24,000,000 Christians; in the eighth century, 30,000,000 Christians; in the ninth century, 40,000,000 Christians; in the tenth century, 50,000,000 Christians; in the eleventh century, 70,000,000 Christians; in the twelfth century, 80,000,000 Christians; in the thirteenth century, 75,000,000 Christians; in the fourteenth century, 80,000,000 Christians; in the fifteenth century, 100,000,000 Christians; in the sixteenth century, 125,000,000 Christians; in the seventeenth century, 155,000,000 Christians; in the eighteenth century, 200,000,000 Christians—a decadence, as you observe, in only one century, and more than made up in the following centuries, while it is the usual computation that there were at the close of the nineteenth century 470,000,000 Christians, making us to believe that before this century is closed the millennium will have started its boom, and lifted its hosanna.

Poor Christianity! what a pity it has no friends. How lonesome it must be. Who will take it out of the poor-house? Poor Christianity! Four hundred millions in one century. In a few weeks of this year, 2,500,000 copies of the New Testament distributed. Why, the earth is like an old castle with twenty gates and a park of artillery ready to thunder down every gate. See how heathendom is being surrounded, and honeycombed, and attacked by this all-conquering Gospel. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, 150 missionaries; at the close of that century, 84,000 missionaries, and native helpers, and evangelists. At the beginning of the nineteenth century there were only 50,000 converts; now there are over one million converts from heathendom.

You all know that an important work of an army is to plant the batteries. It may take many days to plant the batteries, and they may do all the work in ten minutes. These Gospel batteries are being planted all along the seacoasts, and in all nations. It may take a good while to plant them, and they may do all their work in one day. They will. Nations are to be born in a day. But just come back to Christendom and recognize the fact that during the last ten years as many people have connected themselves with evangelical churches, as connected themselves with the churches in the first fifty years of last century. So Christianity is falling back, and the Bible, they say, is becoming an obsolete book. I go into a court, and wherever I find a judge's bench or a clerk's desk, I find a Bible. Upon what book could there be uttered the solemnity of an oath? What book is apt to be put in the trunk of the young man as he leaves for city life? The Bible. What shall I find in nine out of every ten homes in this city? The Bible. In nine out of every ten homes in Christendom? The Bible. Voltaire wrote the prophecy that the Bible in the nineteenth century would become extinct. The century is gone, and I have to tell you that the room in which Voltaire wrote that prophecy, not long ago was crowded from floor to ceiling with Bibles from Switzerland.

The Best-Beloved Book

Suppose the Congress of the United States should pass a law that there should be no more Bibles printed in America, and no Bibles read. If there are sixty million grown people in the United States there would be sixty million people in an army to put down such a law, and defend their right to read the Bible. But suppose the Congress of the United States should make a law against the reading or the publication of any other book, how many people would go out in such a crusade? Could you get sixty million people to go out and risk their lives in the defense of Shakespeare's tragedies, or Gladstone's tracts, or Macaulay's History of England? You know that there are a thousand men who would die in the defense of this Book, where there is not more than one man who would die in the defense of any other book. You try to insult my common sense by telling me the Bible is fading out from the world. It is the most popular book of the centuries.

How do I know it? I know it just as I know in regard to other books. How many volumes of that history are published? Well, you say, five thousand. How many copies of another book are published? A hundred thousand. Which is the more popular? Why, of course, the one that has the hundred thousand circulation. And if this book has more copies abroad in the world, if there are five times as many Bibles abroad as any other book among civilized nations, does not that show you that the most popular book on earth to-day is the Word of God?

"O!" say people, "the church is a collection of hypocrites, and it is losing its power and it is fading out from the world. Is it? A bishop of the Methodist Church told me that that denomination averages two new churches every day. In other words, they build seven hundred and thirty churches in that denomination in a year, and there are at least fifteen hundred new Christian churches built in America every year. Does that look as though the Christian Church were fading out, as though it were a defunct institution? What stands nearest to the hearts of the American people to-day? I do not care in what village, or what city, or what neighborhood you go. What is it? Is it the post office? Is it the hotel? Is it the lecturing hall? Ah! you know it is not. You know that that which stands nearest to the hearts of the American people is the Christian Church.

Near the Heart of the People

You may talk about the church being a collection of hypocrites, but when the diphtheria sweeps your children off, whom do you send for? The postmaster? the attorney-general? the hotel-keeper? alderman? No. You send for a minister of this Bible religion. And if you have not a room in your house for the obsequies, what building do you solicit? Do you say, "Give me the finest room in the hotel?" Do you say, "Give me that theatre?" Do you say, "Give me that public building where I can lay my dead for a little while until we say a prayer over it?" No. You say, "Give us the house of God." And if there is a song to be sung at the obsequies, what do you want? What does anybody want? The Marseillaise hymn? God Save the Queen? Our own grand national air? No. They want the hymn with which they sang their old Christian mother into her last sleep, or they want sung the Sabbath School hymn which their little girl sang the last Sabbath afternoon she was out before she got that awful sickness which broke your heart. I appeal to your common sense. You know the most endearing institution on earth, the most popular institution on earth to-day, is the house of the Lord Jesus Christ. A man is a fool that does not recognize it.

The Infidel Distrusted

The infidels say, "There is great liberty now in this country; freedom of platform; infidelity shows its power from the fact that it is everywhere tolerated, and it can say what it will." Why, my friends, infidelity is no half so blatant in our day as it was in the day of our fathers. Do you know that in the days of our fathers there were pronounced infidels in public authority, and they could get any political position? Let a man declare himself antagonistic to the Christian religion, and what city wants him for mayor, what State wants him for governor, what nation wants him for President or for king? Let a man openly proclaim himself the enemy of our glorious Christianity, and he cannot get a majority of votes in any State, in any city, in any country, in any ward of America.

A distinguished infidel, years ago, riding in a car in Illinois, said, "What has Christianity ever done for this country?" An old Christian woman said, "It has done one thing anyhow; it has kept an infidel from being governor of Illinois." As I stood in the side room of the opera house of Peoria, Ill., a prominent gentleman of that city said, "I can tell you the secret of that infidel's bitterness against Christianity." Said I, "What is it?" "Why," said he, "in this very house there was a great convention to nominate a governor, and there were three or four candidates. At the same time there was in a church in this city a Sabbath School convention, and it happened that one of the men who was in the Sabbath School convention was also a member of the political convention. In the political convention the name highest on the roll at that time and who was nominated was the name of the great champion infidel. There was an adjournment between ball in the afternoon, when the nominations were made, a plain farmer got up and said, 'Mr. Chairman, that nomination must not be made; the Sunday School of Illinois will defeat him.' That ended all of his nomination. The Christian religion is it was in the days of the past. Do you think that such a scene could be enacted now as was enacted in the days of Robespierre, when a shameless woman was taken to the dignity of a goddess, and carried in a golden chair to a cathedral where incense was burned, and people bowed down before her as a Divinity, and she taking the place of the Bible and God; when the corridors of that cathedral were enacted such scenes of drunkenness and debauchery as had never before been witnessed? Do you think such a thing could occur in Christendom to-day? No. The people of Washington, or of New York, or of Paris would swoon upon it. I know infidelity makes a good deal of talk to-day. One infidel can make great excitement, but I can tell you on what principle it is. It is the principle that if a man jumps overboard from a liner, he makes more excitement than all the hundred who stay on board. But the fact that a man jumps overboard does not stop the ship. Does the wreck of the five hundred passengers? It makes great excitement when a man jumps from the lecturing platform from the pulpit into infidelity; but does that stop the Bible or the church from carrying millions of passengers to the shores of eternal safety?

These opponents say that science is overcoming religion in our day. They look through the spectacles of the infidel scientists, and they say, "It is impossible that this book be true; people are finding it out; the Bible has got to go overboard. Science is going to throw it overboard." Do you believe that the Bible account of the origin of life will be overturned by infidel scientists who have fifty different theories about the origin of life? If they should all come up in a phalanx, all agreeing on one sentiment and one theory, perhaps Christianity might be damaged; but there are not so many differences of opinion inside the church as outside the church. O! it makes me sick to see literary fops going along with a copy of Darwin's one arm, and a case of transfixed grasshoppers, and butterflies under the other arm, telling about the "survival of the fittest" and Huxley's protoplasm, and the nebular hypothesis. The fact is that some nations, just as soon as they find out the difference between the feelers of a wasp and the horns of a beetle, begin to patronize the Almighty; while Agassiz, glorious as he was, who never made any pretension to being a Christian, puts both his feet on the doctrine of evolution, and

OLD LEPER HOSPITAL, GUAM

PROCESSION AT THE DEDICATION

THE ARSENAL, NOW AN HOSPITAL

A NEW ERA IN LITTLE GUAM

THIS is not a new lesson. No, for years it has been taught us in noble example by the medical missionaries of China and India; by valiant priests, who have fought a way for religion to save hearts by means of their healing powers; and the strength of our mighty Government, not the solid efforts of missionaries, is being applied to this worthy labor throughout our Island territory. No, it has been begun, and General Wood, at San Juan; General Ludlow, at Havana; Generals Henry and Davis, and Dr. Hoff, in Puerto Rico, and the Army Medical Corps at Manila, have shown us what splendid results may be accomplished.

To say that medical service in Guam—our smallest colonial possession—under Spanish rule was deficient would be to express it far too mildly. It was virtually lacking. Upon an island, twenty-six miles long and over five miles wide, with a population of over 20,000 souls, there were but two regular physicians. One was the medical officer of the Spanish Army, who was too busy to attend to the officials and garrison. He generally scorned to treat the poor natives, and did little except exercise the very nominal function of quarantine officer. The civil doctor was a nervous Spaniard, who appeared to show little zeal or interest in the sick, but was interested in his estate and financial affairs. The natives are not a sickly race, but neglect and ignorance, and the bearing whaling ships and a heritage of ancestral idolatry had done much to spread disease among them. One of all, leprosy was present. Towards this last disease only apparent attempt at relief made, for a hospital for lepers was built upon the high road between Agaña and Piti. This was a fairly good building. One wing was for women, and one for men, with a nearby cottage for the attendants. The lepers were collected there to live until death released them. Their relatives were required to provide them with sustenance, and lived in a neighboring village. There are not over a dozen known cases of leprosy in the island. It is needless to say that our American medical officers have taken all precautions to isolate these.

Their ignorance of all sanitary laws laid the Guamanese open to severe attacks of typhoid fever. Most of the people are collected into towns, about half of the whole population being in the town of Agaña alone. These towns are built near the beach upon flat sandy soil, without any system of sewerage and with almost no natural drainage. Their water supply came from shallow wells dug in the sand in the heart of the village. Typhoid was so common that the natives had come to regard it with a sort of apathetic helplessness. Nearly every adult had at some stage passed through the disease. As soon as Agaña was occupied by the American marines active measures were taken to supply distilled water from the ship, close up the wells and install the distilling plant that had been brought out. The town was thoroughly policed, and every precaution taken to prevent the use of the infected water. In spite of these efforts though, typhoid made its dread appearance among the soldiers, but was soon brought under control. The climate is not injurious, however, nor sickly in any degree.

Meanwhile the long-neglected native population was being cared for with the best energies of the limited force of physicians. Three surgeons were available for this work: Surgeon Philip Leach, U. S. Navy, and Assistant Surgeons Mack V. Stone and Alfred G. Grunwell, U. S. Navy, and long and well have they labored and with great success. Then the force was strengthened by the arrival of Assistant Surgeon W. L. Bell, U. S. Navy. At Agaña, the former arsenal was converted into a temporary hospital, one wing being assigned to the garrison and one to the natives. Both were soon filled, while Dr. Grunwell was confronted with a tremendous outside practice among the natives. Patients of every kind came pouring in to him and great relief was given. The natives could not realize at first that all this attendance, all the medicines were free. Many cases of long standing were relieved and cured, and the gratitude of these poor folk was beyond bounds. Fired with enthusiasm, the natives at Agaña voluntarily set to work to build a larger hospital building. Led by the captain of the town, all hands worked vigorously and well, and soon a neat thatched house with beds for twenty patients was completed. The natives now asked that they might have "a real American flag" over their hospital. This request was soon granted, and one day the hospital was dedicated with elaborate ceremonies and the "Stars and Stripes" raised over it—the first native American hospital in Guam. The ceremonies included a parade, an address, much bell-ringing, a salute from a revolver and from some ancient mortars. It was a quaint, absurd sort of affair to us who saw it, but of gravest moment to the simple folk, to whom the new flag they so proudly carried represented much: freedom from oppression, from tyranny, from misery and disease; a new era indeed.

The good work so well begun is being carried on vigorously; the medical department of the Navy aiding with medicines and supplies and the necessary instruments. A new and commodious hospital is to be built at Agaña, and further effort will be made to bring all parts of the island under medical attendance. All this work is being done as a part of our naval duty. It is not as charity that the work is carried on, but as an obligation.

There remains much to be done in this lovely island before it can be called our "model colony," but as far as its sanitary condition is concerned, everything is being done possible to make that perfect.

PLOUGHMAN AND REAPER; Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage

"I see that many of the naturalists of our day are rejecting facts which do not bear observation, or are not passed under observation. These men warring with each other—Darwin warring against Lamarck, Wallace warring against Cope, even Herschel denouncing erguson. They do not agree about anything. They do not agree on embryology, do not agree on the origin of the species."

What do they agree on? Herschel writes a whole book on the errors of astronomy. La Place declares the moon was not put in the right place. He says it had been put four times further from the earth than it is now, there would be more harmony in the universe; but Lionville comes up just in time to prove the moon was put in the right place. How many are woven into the light? Seven, says Isaac Newton. But, says David Brewster. How high is the Aurora borealis? Two and a half miles, says Lias. Ninety miles, say other scientists. How far is the sun from the earth? Seventy-six million miles, says Lacalle. Eighty-million miles, says Humboldt. Ninety-million miles, says Henderson. One hundred and four million miles, says Mayer. Only a little difference of twenty-eight million miles! All split up among themselves—not getting on anything.

Triumph Approaching

These infidel scientists have empanelled themselves as a jury to decide this trial between Infidelity, the plaintiff, and Christianity, the defendant, and after they sit out for centuries, they come in to render their verdict. Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed on a verdict? No, no. Then go back for another five hundred years and deliberate and agree on something. This is not a poor miserable wretch in the city prison now that could be condemned by a jury that did not agree on the verdict, and yet you expect us to give up our glorious Christianity to please these men who do not agree on anything. Ah! my friends, the Church is not Christ, instead of falling back, is on the advance. I am certain it is on the advance. I see the shining of the swords, I hear the tramping of the troops, I hear the thundering parks of artillery. O! God, I thank thee that I have been permitted to see this day of thy triumph, this day of the confusion of thine enemies.

I am mightily encouraged because I find among other things that while this Christianity has been bombarded for centuries, infidelity has not destroyed one church, or crippled one minister, or uprooted one verse of one chapter of all the Bible. If that has been their magnificent record for the centuries of the past, what may we expect for the future? The Church getting the victory, and their shot and shell all gone.

A Powerful Ally

And then I find another most encouraging thought in the fact that the secular printing-press and the pulpit seem harnessed in the same team for the proclamation of the Gospel. Every banker in this capital to-morrow, every Wall street banker to-morrow in New York, every State street banker to-morrow in Boston, every Third street banker to-morrow in Philadelphia, every banker in the United States, and every merchant, will have in his pocket a treatise on Christianity, ten, twenty or thirty passages of Scripture in the reports of sermons preached throughout the land to-day. It will be so in Chicago, so in New Orleans, so in Charleston, so in Boston, so in Philadelphia, so in Cincinnati, so everywhere. I know the tract societies are doing a grand and glorious work, but I tell you there is no power on earth to-day equal to the fact that the American printing-press is taking up the sermons which are preached to a few hundred or a few thousand people, and on Monday morning and Monday evening, scattering that truth to the millions. What an encouragement for every Christian man.

Then you have noticed a more significant fact if you have talked with people on the subject, that they are getting dissatisfied with worldly philosophy as a matter of comfort. They say it does not amount to anything when you have a dead child in the house. They tell you when they were sick and the door of the future seemed opening, the only comfort they could find was the Gospel. People are having demonstrated all over the land that science and philosophy cannot solace the troubles and woes of the world, and they want some other religion, and they are taking Christianity.

The Only Sympathetic Religion

That ever came from heaven into this sorrowing world. You just take a scientific consolation into that room where a mother has lost her child. Try in that case your splendid doctrine of the "survival of the fittest." Tell her that child died because it was not worth as much as the other children. That is your "survival of the fittest." Just try your transcendentalism, your philosophy, your science, on that widowed soul, and tell her it was a geological necessity that her companion should be taken away from her, just as in the course of the world's history the megatherium and the ichthyosaurus had to pass out of existence; and then you go on in your scientific consolation until you get to the sublime fact that fifty million years from now we ourselves may be scientific specimens on the geologic shelf, petrified specimens of an extinct human race. And after you have got all through with your consolation, if the poor afflicted soul is not crazed by it, we will send forth from any of our churches the plainest Christian we have, and with one half hour of prayer and reading of Scripture promises, the tears will be wiped away, and the house from floor to cupola will be flooded with the calmness of an Indian summer sunset. There is where I see the triumph of Christianity. People are dissatisfied with everything else. They want God. They want Jesus Christ.

Young man, do not be ashamed to be a friend of the Bible. Do not put your thumb in your vest, as young men sometimes do, and swagger about, talking of the glorious light of nature, and of there being no need of the Bible. They have the light of nature in India and China, and in all the dark places of the earth. Did you ever hear that the light of nature gave them comfort for their trouble? They have lancets to cut and juggernauts to crush, but no comfort. Ah! my friends, you had better stop your scepticism.

AN ARMY of YOUNG CHRISTIAN WORKERS FOR HEATHENDOM

IN the six weeks beginning with the first of August, the Presbyterian Board will send out over one hundred missionaries to the foreign field. Of these, perhaps fifty will be missionaries who have been in harness for some time and who are returning to their duties. The others will be fresh young workers, on their first journey to carry the message of the Cross over the seas. Forty-seven of this band have already been appointed.

The Board is facing a new and novel situation. The present demand and provision for missionaries exceeds the supply. Transportation and support are available for a larger number than are listed. This state of affairs is due in part to the inauguration of a new policy with regard to the raising of funds. The Board has asked different churches and societies to undertake to care for particular mission fields, making themselves financially responsible; and the result has been that a host is gladly coming forward to the help of the Gospel cause. Thus, the regular funds of the Board are supplemented, and a glorious enlargement of work made possible. Another reason for difficulty in filling up the list, is that extraordinary pains must be taken in selection. There are applications in abundance, but the requirements which are needed to make up a good foreign missionary worker are numerous. The question of health is among the many that have to be considered. "We must put our very best material in the foreign field," says Dr. Halsey, "if we want to secure the best results. We are looking now," he added, "for two good men for the Philippines."

To equip and send out this band of missionaries will cost the Board at least $50,000, and during the fiscal year more than $1,000,000 will be spent in the foreign field. "Few other missionary boards in the country," says Dr. Halsey, "raises as large an amount. Last year, we spent $950,000. While the policy of having churches and societies undertake the support of missionaries has had much to do with increasing our funds, other causes were at work. Our sending out a million missionary leaflets had something to do with it. Then, we had twenty missionaries speaking all over the country; and here in the building, much work has been done through talks and addresses." In addition to this, it may be said that public opinion generally has had during the past few years exceptional opportunities for education as to the real character and value of the foreign missionary. Occasions that at first glance seemed to operate against the cause itself have contributed to its strength.

"The missionaries in China are a troublous lot," said some carping critics. "Missionaries in the East are no good." But the men of the British and American fleets, among whom these missionaries have wrought a great revival, have a different tale to tell of the cultured men and women who made them feel at home in a strange land, and the beauty and devotion of whose lives inspired them to study its divine origin and to accept the same great Master. We have seen, too, that if we want to make men more humane and merciful in the Orient, if we want to prevent the shedding of blood and unspeakable outrages besides, we have got to teach men Christ.

Repeated ministrations on the part of Christian America to India's starving millions, will surely make a smoother pathway there for the messengers of Jesus, who come with tidings of peace and hope and brotherly pity, the meaning of which must have a deeper significance now than ever before. In China, the same mercy shown to starving natives, should open many hearts that have been closed heretofore against the servants of Christ. America's attitude in the Chinese troubles, will doubtless have weight also in making the American missionary, be he preacher, teacher or physician, more acceptable, because of his nationality, than workers from various other lands might be.

The sight of this brave young army going out to different countries for Christ, is a vision of hope to his church at large. Accomplished and educated men and women they are—preachers, teachers and physicians—with life promising fair to them in their native land. The pathways of the various members of the band lie far apart.

So far, there are three new missionaries for West Africa, three for central China, three for Shantung, three for Canton; India has ten; West Japan two; Korea six; Persia four; Siam two; Chili one; and some have not been assigned. Of the missionaries whose portraits are on this page, R. D. Schoonmaker goes to Africa; Miss Churchill to Canton; Rev. H. G. Romig, to Shantung; Miss Ricketts, to Central China; Miss Campbell, Miss Jenks, Miss Johnson, Miss Lincoln, Rev. R. D. Tracy, Rev. and Mrs. John M. Lawrence, are for India; Rev. and Mrs. Armstrong, for Siam; Rev. and Mrs. Blair and Miss Henry, for Korea; Miss Mayo goes to Japan; Miss McPherson to Brazil; Rev. Mr. McIntire, to the Philippines; Dr. Tooker and Rev. Mr. Mattison are unassigned. The newly-appointed missionaries came before the Board of Foreign Missions, at its fourth annual conference, in the Assembly Rooms, at 156 Fifth avenue, June 12-19; and the occasion was one of great interest. The new workers had the opportunity of listening to many excellent and instructive addresses from a number of the strongest men in the Church. "The Missionary and his Relations to Native Religions and Customs," "Missionary Accounting," "Treasury, Travel, Outfit," "The Missionary's Relation to Governments," "Missionary Ethics," and other equally vital and intensely practical as well as spiritual problems of the foreign missionary's life were discussed. The relation of foreign missionary to home missionary work was also brought under a helpful and intelligent review. The Presbyterians are to be congratulated on this missionary campaign. Other denominations are doubtless preparing to do as much. Too much cannot be given or spent to win the world for Christ, and if ever there was a time for successful invasion of heathendom, that time is now.

ANOTHER $20,000 FOR STARVING CHINA

The Second Remittance from the Fund Cabled to our Distributing Committee in the Field

LAST week the second remittance of $20,000 was cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, to the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Tientsin, Chairman of our Missionary Famine Relief Committee. This makes a total of $40,000 sent to the Committee since the work began. Long ere this writing, the first relief wagons will have reached Tai-yuen-fu in Shansi, though no message has yet come through from the workers. Some of them started out with other missionaries under the protection of the escort furnished by Earl Li Hung Chang, on ment come in every mail in increasing numbers, and the great majority of the writers are enthusiastic in their support of the practical application to China of the Christian principle of returning good for evil, and heaping "coals of fire" upon the heads of those who were the enemies of Christianity. All over our land, prayers are ascending for China's speedy relief, and also for her spiritual regeneration.

We give below extracts from several of these communications:

Helen M. B., Albany, N. Y. ($2), writes: "I wish it were a hundred times as much. May God bless you!"

"Accept this small gift of love from a poor woman, who loves her Lord and Saviour," writes E. D. T. (St), Toronto, Ont.

"For the perishing in Shansi," writes B. W. J., Nashville, Tex. "Oh! that the people may open their hearts in giving relief to our Chinese brethren now at the point of starvation. This is our time to show them the love of Christ."

"May the glorious light of the Gospel soon dawn upon them that they may be fed spiritually is my prayer," writes another contributor, George S., South Cayuga, Ont.

"It is the Lord's Tenth" ($4), writes "Sister in Christ," Champorg, Oreg. "It is sent with a prayer that God will bless it to the use of starving humanity."

Mrs. H. M. B., "an old lady who wishes to deny herself," sends $3 that she may help needy ones in China.

"God grant that their great suffering and Christian America's help may be the means of bringing them to live and serve God," writes H. L. W., Campbell, Minn.

Sadie W., Perris, Cal. ($1.40) writes: "It may be a means to an end, as bringing the Christian spirit of our people in contact with these Chinese, who have suffered mostly from our worst class, and judge us all accordingly."

"I think it a fine opportunity to render good for evil. May God help the poor sufferers, and make them Christians by these means," writes Mrs. E. H. R., Aten, Neb.

"We know that it is but a 'drop in the ocean,' needed, ($2), but our mite with God's blessing will help to save the starving. May Christian America's gift, in this their time of great need, convince them that we are not their enemies, but are actuated by love for their souls," write Mr. and Mrs. G. B., Danbury, Conn.

Friend, Kansas, ($5) writes: "I hope it may be the means not only of saving a life, but maybe some souls for Jesus."

"I felt so sorry for them I decided to make an effort to collect some money ($15) to be used for their relief," writes Miss Abbie Burgess, Chester Hill, O.

Mr. A. O. Patzsch, Canonsburg, Pa., writes: "Enclosed find check for forty dollars for the famine sufferers, sent by the Y. P. S. C. E., First Presbyterian Church of Canonsburg. In His name. May he feed hungry, thirsty souls, as well as their bodies, through this offering."

"The widow's mite. I am old and poor and have no way of making any money, so I will send some of what I have," writes Mrs. E. F. Wilson, of Beaumont, Tex. ($1).

Mrs. R. J. Butterfield, Ayer, Mass. ($3), writes: "My prayers go with the gift that God may add his blessing, and that the result of China's great affliction may be untold spiritual blessings for her perishing millions."

G. W. Brown, Columbia, Pa. ($2), writes: "I enclose two dollars for the famine sufferers in China. A chord of sympathy in my heart was touched when reading in your paper of the calamity. I am glad THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has so interested itself in the cause of suffering humanity, that it has really become, to a very great extent, the vehicle to carry, and the medium through, and by which relief funds are sent and properly distributed among the hungry and starving, not only sending the contributions of others, but giving largely of its own means."

I enclose ten dollars for the famine in China, five for myself and five for my wife. The antidote for hatred and prejudice is love; by acting in that way toward the heathen people may induce them to cast their idols to the mole, and to the bat, and come to worship the Giver of every good and perfect gift. I hope China and India will learn the lesson God in his providence intends to teach them by wars, famine and pestilence.

Please find one dollar (postal note) which I send to help relieve the famine sufferers of China. I send this in the blessed name of our dear Saviour, Jesus Christ. I pray the Lord to bless and strengthen the missionaries in their work, and also in all work of loving kindness wherever it is needed. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A SUBSCRIBER.

Enclosed find New York Exchange for $100 to assist in the needs of the Shansi famine sufferers of China. Our prayers go with this, that you may so place it as to do the greatest possible good to the starving millions. I am glad to know that you are raising money for the benefit of the sufferers in China. Many, like myself, were only waiting for an appeal from some reliable source, ready to fall into line for concerted action in so good a cause. I am pleased to enclose my check for $100, and trust you may be very successful in this undertaking. (Name not to be used.)

CHINESE BEGGAR

July 22, proceeding by rail to Ting Cho, by carts to Huailu and finishing the journey by mule litters to Tai-yuen-fu. According to the correspondent of the Sun, they will stop one day at Shou Yang, the scene of the former mission. After reaching Tai-yuen-fu, the China Inland missionaries will visit the outlying stations.

A striking contrast to the hurried flight of the missionaries from Shansi last year, is their return, under official auspices and with dignity and the assurance of a cordial welcome from the scattered remnant of the native mission congregations. Shan, the capital of Tai-yuen-fu, came specially to "bring them company." It is said that the Imperial Government has decided that receptions should be tendered by officials to the missionaries along the whole route, that residences be made ready for them at the places of destination, and that high officials of the Government attend the funerals of the martyred missionaries.

One of the first sad duties of the returned missionaries will be to recover the remains of those workers who were massacred by the Boxers, and to give them Christian burial, with appropriate ceremonies.

While these faithful workers are carrying the Gospel of bread and blessing to the famine-stricken multitudes in the four Chinese provinces, the good people at home are nobly and generously rallying to their support. Letters with contributions and words of cheer and encourage-

Our China Relief Committee

IT is a high tribute which the press generally has paid to the members of our Missionary Famine Relief Committee in China, but it is by no means an unmerited one. All are men of distinction in their various denominations, servants of the Master, who have worthily won the confidence and esteem of his people by the zeal, fidelity and single-mindedness that have marked their several careers in the missionary field.

Rev. Arthur H. Smith, D.D., the Chairman, is a representative of the American Board, and has done valuable service in Tientsin and other parts of China. Educated at Beloit College, after taking the regular theological course at Andover and Union Seminaries, he entered the missionary field in 1870. He can point to twenty-six years' consecutive labor, and is unquestionably one of the ablest American missionaries now in the Orient. In addition to his long missionary labors, he is widely known as an author and is recognized as one of the highest authorities in Chinese sociology. His book on Chinese Characteristics, originally published at Shanghai and afterward reproduced in America, is a standard of valuable information and research, and his Village Life in China, a later volume, is accepted as among the brightest additions to our knowledge of China and its people that have yet appeared from the pen of any European or American author. In his most recent work, China in Convulsion, he deals with the recent uprising, its causes and effects.

Rev. Irenaeus Atwood, D.D., of the American Board, and Rev. H. H. Lowry, of the Methodist Mission, are also Americans who have served long and honorably in the China field; while Rev. E. H. Edwards, M.B., of the China Inland Mission, and Rev. M. B. Duncan, of the English Baptist Mission, are both veterans in the work. All have had practical experience in previous famines which must now prove especially valuable in view of the relief work to which they have been summoned at the height of the severest famine ever known in Chinese history.

These gallant workers are now out in the field, succoring the weak and feeding the famishing in Shansi and Shensi, and aiding the destitute in Shantung and Chih-li. Their task is not without danger, for there are risks always to be encountered in a country where the fever of war and insurrection has scarcely yet abated, and there is also the still more insidious and deadly danger of lurking disease in the various forms of fever, dysentery and the pestilence that follows in the shadow of war. But they have not hesitated, even for a moment, to accept the burden laid upon them of ministering to the famine-stricken multitudes. Like true Christian soldiers, knowing their duty, they go forward boldly, leaving all in God's hands, and content, if need be, to give their lives to this consecrated mission.

Let our people all over this great and prosperous land, hold up the hands of these brave missionaries, who are now out in the field among the dead and dying. They need our prayers, and they need also our gifts, for it is at our call they have gone forth. Let them not be disappointed.

Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said: It is more blessed to give than to receive. Acts 20: 35.

Dull Mondays

TO many good people Monday is the most uncomfortable day of the week because of the overwrought condition the previous day. Many of the best people feel Mondayish. They overdid the Sunday and had no rest. They rose at six to study their Bible lesson. They attended two preaching services, and had a hankering after the third. They went twice to Sabbath school—one in the morning, the other in the afternoon. They took part in a prayer-meeting. They visited two of the sick. They have been intoxicated with excess of meetings. Monday morning is a weariness to them. Satan knows they are good, and is trying to work them to death and get them out of the way. They are beckoning to their undertaker, and committing suicide with golden extract of overworked Sunday.

Now, every man is entitled to rest. He sins when, at least once a week, he does not take it. On Sabbath let him sleep an hour longer in the morning, or snatch up a nap in the afternoon, or put on his slippers for a little while, with his feet up on the next chair, and make himself believe, at any rate, that he is resting. Doing too many things on Sunday, he does nothing well. He must take time to cool off. It is dangerous to load a cannon while the touch-hole is hot. Some Christians serve God so tremendously on Sunday that they are cross and crabbed all the week. Every Monday morning ought to be set to the tune of "Ariel" or "Antioch," and not to "Wyndham" or "Naomi."

Saturday afternoon free from work is a cure for Mondayishness. If you want a Sunday to sail well, you ought to launch it Saturday afternoon. If a minister has to study exhaustingly the latter part of the week, it is generally because he has been lazy the former part of the week. There is nothing that so hurts a sermon as to jam it between the wheels of Saturday night and Sunday morning. One of the ablest ministers used to say that he did all his hard mental work after ten o'clock Saturday night. At that late hour he would take to his study a tea-pot and pack of first-rate cigars, and go at his two sermons. He quit life early and went away, compelled to leave behind him his tea-pot and box of cigars. I should rather go up in almost any other chariot than a cloud of tobacco smoke. Not Saturday night, but Wednesday and Thursday are the best cradles in which to rock a sermon after it has been born.

The Mondayish feeling sometimes comes to the ministry, because it is the day the clerical profession do what they call "odds and ends," and visit the sick. Instead of taking it easy that morning, they are so worried about the errands they have to do. Monday is a poor day for visiting the sick. It is bad for the minister and the invalid to whom he goes. When I am sick, save me from a minister who himself has "the dumps." We need to be strong when we go to help the weak. What the sick most need is a dose of sunlight; and how can we pour it out to them unless we have a steady hand? There is no use of going in to sit on the bedside and help the invalid groan. Better take to him your tuning-fork and give him the pitch of "the new song." Do not spend Monday in rushing about; "odds and ends" have killed many a minister. Sunday is a trying day; let Saturday on one side of it, and Monday on the other side of it, take hold its arms and help it through. Do not spend Monday in going around to see "how the sermon took." If it was faithful, I warrant that in some quarters it did not take at all.

They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength. Isa. 40: 31.

Beefsteak for Ministers

THERE are no harder worked men on earth than the ministers of religion. Many of them are on insufficient salaries, and the food they take is not nutritious. How can you expect a strong sermon from a pastor who has incompetent diet? Indeed, the damage begins at the college boarding-house. The theological student has generally small means, and he must go to a cheap boarding-house. A frail piece of sausage trying to swim across a river of gravy on the breakfast plate, but drowned at last; "the linked sweetness long drawn out" of flies in the molasses cup; the gristle of a tough ox, and measly biscuit, and buckwheat cakes tough as the cook's apron, and old peas in which the bugs lost their life before they had time to escape from the saucepan, and stale cucumbers cut up into small slices of cholera morbus—are the provender out of which we are trying, in theological seminaries, to make "sons of thunder." Sons of mush! From such depletion we step gasping into the pulpit, and look so heavenly pale that the mothers in Israel are afraid we will evaporate before we get through our first sermon.

The Scripture saith: Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. I. Tim. 5: 18.

Thanks for Newspapers

SOME people have a habit of decrying one of our greatest necessities. Perhaps they have some time been abused in print and they cannot forget the mean personality? What would we do without the newspaper? With the iron rake of the telegraph it draws the whole world to our door every morning. The sermon that the minister preached to five hundred people on Sabbath, the newspaper the next day preaches to fifty thousand. It takes the verse which the poet chimed in his small room of ten feet breadth and rings them into the ears of the continent. The cylinder of the printing-press is to be one of the wheels of the Lord's chariot.

The good newspapers will overcome the bad ones, and the honey-bees will outnumber the hornets. Instead of the three or four religious newspapers that once lived on gruel and pap, sitting down once a week on some good man's door-step to rest, thankful not kicked off, now all of the denominations have star journals that swing their scythes through the sins of the world, and are avant couriers of the Lord's coming.

How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things. Rom. 10: 15.

A Wise Relief Work

(From the Review of Reviews)

FAMINE and pestilence usually follow war, and afford no exception to that rule. Starvation prevails in some extensive regions, particularly in the province of Shansi. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, says so energetic in relief work, is raising a large fund, and has already sent $20,000. In helping the suffering Chinese women and children in this time of their great emergency, we are not only showing kindness to a gentle and patient people who have never done us any wrong even in the most trying times, but we are also doing something to insure good relations between this country and China, a consummation much to be desired. The distribution of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's fund is intrusted to a committee of leading missionaries, than whom no men could possibly handle it more wisely.

Lifting Up Dying China

WHEREVER the Chinese question—and especially that aspect of it which has reference to the terrible famine and consequent suffering in Shansi—is discussed, whether by missionaries, travelers, converted Chinamen or fair-minded, educated, observant people of that nation, it is conceded that the only influence that can affect the conservatism of forty centuries is the combination of Gospel teaching and practical, sympathetic helpfulness. What America is now doing to raise fallen China and lead her out of spiritual darkness; to bind up her wounds, feed and clothe her famished multitudes, and bring back peace to her borders, will be more effective than all else in wooing her from her idols and the traditions that hold her people in a grasp of iron.

The story of the starving multitude who cry for bread from the province of Shansi has reached the ears of the American people. A door of opportunity is open for us to show the true spirit of Christianity, by acts of benevolence. The appeal of Li Hung Chang to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for aid to his suffering countrymen, and the quick response of President McKinley and other high officials, shows that the humanitarian spirit prevails at the seat of our Government.

It ought to be our watchword, "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you," and, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus, to overcome evil with good, by sending money to procure food that will feed the multitudes of suffering people in that far country. Joseph was sent into Egypt to save his brethren, and may not we, as a nation, in the name of God, be his instrument to save our Chinese brethren and teach them the lesson of Christian brotherhood? May not we, like the good Samaritan, hasten to their relief, binding up their wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and saying, "Be warmed, be clothed, be fed. Am I not thy neighbor, thy friend, thy brother?"

The hour has come for us to obey this commandment of our Lord, and show love to our Chinese neighbor, by sending our money and our influence to induce Christian people to pour out their gold to feed the millions of hungry people in China, who must perish unless help is immediately sent to them. Our work to-day, is to prepare the way for the Gospel by acts of love to our kinsmen of China!

A Chinaman who was very poor had a lovely little daughter, called Geuk Ching ("Poor chrysanthemum flower") who had no one to take care of her, as her mother was dead, and her father had to be in the field all day. A heathen man offered twenty dollars for her, that he might betroth her to his son! The father, although very poor, said, "I will not sell her to you, for you are a heathen, who would teach her to worship idols. She must be with some one who will teach her about God, so she will meet her mother in heaven!" He then offered her to some missionary ladies who were in the village, and they took little Geuk Ching into their home. She was so lovable, that when the heathen women came in and saw the child's love for the foreign ladies they lost their fear, and thus through her the missionaries gained the confidence of the heathen women. So the power of Christian love alone will win the Chinese to Jesus. By every impulse of sanctified humanity, we ought to do much to help these Chinese, who cannot help themselves. Let the church of Jesus Christ lead the way.

The Great Flood

EVERY section of the country sympathizes deeply with the State of West Virginia in the calamity that has desolated one of its most prosperous districts. Happily the fears at first entertained of the loss of life prove to have been exaggerated, but there is reason to believe that above sixty persons perished in the disaster. It appears that early on the morning of Sunday, June 23, there was a terrific deluge of rain, lasting six hours, in the Elkhorn River Valley, near the northern boundary of Virginia. It is a deep valley, almost a gorge, on each side of which rise the all ridges of the Alleghany Mountains. It contains some of the best coal fields in the South and is inhabited chiefly by the miners and their families. Innumerable streams run down the sides of the mountains, feeding the Elkhorn River, which, in a time of flood, rises with extraordinary rapidity. Soon after daybreak on Sunday morning the people realized that there was danger coming. At Keystone, by nine o'clock, the river, high at its banks, came rushing through the town, sweeping everything before it. At Burke, one of its suburbs, the destruction was complete, and eight persons were caught in the flood and drowned. The narrow mountain

It is reported that Judge Humphreys favors the scheme, and has gone to Washington to explain it to the President. Several prominent Hawaiians are strong advocates of it. It remains to be seen whether the State of California would accept such an addition to its constituency, and whether Congress would approve it. There seems no valid reason why, if the Hawaiian people understand our Constitution, and will be loyal to it, why they should not be thus incorporated and become an integral part of the United States. But that condition is essential, as it is in the kingdom of heaven. When we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we too often forget that this world can never become a part of the heavenly kingdom until its people can be trusted to be absolutely loyal to its King.

Risking a Battleship

The news that the fine warship Massachusetts had been taken through Hell Gate was a surprise to many citizens. The vessel was going to Newburyport from the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Smaller vessels would naturally take the course up the Sound, as it is shorter; but this was the first time that so large a craft as the Massachusetts apparatus, consisting only of a loose wire a few feet in length, dangled from the masthead of the Government vessel, Conway, which is anchored in the Mersey, as a guard to the harbor. Farther on, another mast was erected at Holyhead, from which another short wire hung loose. As the Lucania steamed out of the harbor messages were sent from her to the Conway, and were easily read on the latter vessel. As the Lucania continued her voyage through St. George's Channel, communication with the Conway ceased, but in a short time the telegraph instrument again began ticking, and messages were being transmitted to Holyhead. Not until the Cunarder was more than a hundred miles from land was communication broken, and the vessel out of touch with the shore. An apparatus is now being fixed at Nantucket, so that the period of silence will be shortened at both ends. When it is completed, an incoming vessel equipped with the Marconi apparatus will be able to talk with the operator at Nantucket when it comes within a hundred miles of our shores. Only a few years ago a man would have been laughed to scorn who thought it possible that messages could be sent from a ship to people on the shore a hundred miles away. Sceptics, who have been ridiculing Christians as credulous, for believing that uttered prayer on earth could reach the ear of God, must surely feel as they read of this achievement that they have been over hasty in pronouncing prayer useless:

He heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears (Ps. 18: 6).

valley was filled with seething waters. Huge boulders were being hurled against the mountain side. The railroad track was being torn up and twisted in a hundred different shapes. Huge trees were torn up by their roots, telegraph poles washed away and whole buildings were taken up and smashed into kindling wood. The whole of the Flat Top coal region was covered, and the flood extended from the Clinch Valley to the Elkhorn. It speedily passed, but it left behind it a heart-breaking scene of desolation. At North Fork Junction seven buildings were swept away in ten minutes. Substantial bridges were carried from their foundations, and railroad stations, with the cars, were seen floating down the stream. One train was side-tracked to escape the flood, but it was soon nearly filled with water, and the passengers had to be rescued by ropes from the windows of the cars to the top of some coke ovens. The pictures on this page, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the New York Tribune, are photographs, and show how terrible was the disaster. The loss of property will be enormous. The mine owners and the roads will be the chief sufferers, but many of the miners must have lost their all when their houses were swept away. That more persons were not killed than there were, is due to the fact that they were warned that the flood was coming, and they made good their escape to the mountains. It is a pity that people who are warned of spiritual danger are not similarly prudent.

For ye refuse not him that speaketh; for if they escaped not, ye refused him that spoke on earth, much more shall not we repent, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven (Heb. 12: 25).

An Outlying District

A newspaper in Honolulu discusses a novel plan for the solution of the difficulties connected with the government of the Hawaiian Islands. At present, the government of Hawaii as a Territory is as unsatisfactory as it is expensive. Political quarrels frequently arise and are very difficult of adjustment. So far, the income derived from the islands pays but a very small part of the expenses of governing them. The new proposal, which, according to the Honolulu journal, emanates from Dr. David Starr Jordan, President of Stanford University, is to make the islands a part of the State of California. They might become five counties, constituting a Congressional District of the State, and would thus have a share in the State Legislature and a representation in the United States Senate and House, as California's Senators and Representatives would have charge of Hawaiian interests. It is reported that Judge Humphreys favors the scheme, and has gone to Washington to explain it to the President. Several prominent Hawaiians are strong advocates of it. It remains to be seen whether the State of California would accept such an addition to its constituency, and whether Congress would approve it. Talking Through Space

A notable experiment was tried on board the Cunard steamer Lucania, during the voyage she has just made from Liverpool to New York. presidency of Armour Institute in Chicago, which he resigned some years ago.

The University of Oxford, England, has conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity on Prof. C. A. Briggs, whom the General Assembly of the American Presbyterian Church condemned. This is an honor very seldom conferred on a foreigner, and indicates that this seat of learning holds the American divine in very high respect.

The summer conferences of the American Committee of Young Women's Christian Associations, will be held at East Northfield, Mass., July 12-22, and at Lake Geneva, Wis., July 2-12. Among the speakers are Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Mrs. Howard Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, Dr. W. W. White, of Montclair, N. J., and Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, of New York.

It is gratifying to learn that the Filipinos are availing themselves of the sanction of religion in their social relations, which they had been dispensing with, owing to the heavy fees of the priests. Bishop Graves reports that Rev. Henry Swift, who was a missionary among the Indians in South Dakota, and is now a chaplain in the army, stationed in Luzon, has been baptizing and marrying large numbers of Filipinos and Chinese, and is doing educational work among the natives.

Our readers, especially those who are students of prophecy, will grieve to hear of the death of Bishop Nicholson, of the Reformed Episcopal Church. Few men have so thoroughly earned the deep love and reverence of God's people as he. Though he had attained the age of seventy-nine years, it seems hard to believe that we shall hear his voice no more. A ripe scholar, a tender and earnest pastor, a wise and sympathetic counsellor, his death leaves a void that will not easily be filled.

A brief cable message from Western Africa contains the sorrowful tidings of the death of Rev. D. W. Le Lacheur, of the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Mr. Le Lacheur had served as a missionary in China, but of late years had done his most effective work in visiting the mission stations of the Alliance in various lands. He had been able to encourage the missionaries in their loneliness and assure them of the constant prayerfulness of the brethren at home, and so cheer them as to strengthen their hearts for renewed effort. It was on one of these journeys that he was engaged when he reached the Soudan. There he was stricken with African fever, which has proved fatal.

NOAH SAVED
IN THE ARK...

* MERCY AND JUDGMENT *

...BY...
DR. AND MR.
WILBUR F. CROTS

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 22. GEN. 8: 1-24.

GOLDEN TEXT--NOAH FOUND GRACE IN THE EYES OF THE LORD. GEN. 6: 8.

More than seven thousand people were drowned in the twenty-three chief wrecks of the nineteenth century. The heirs of one of these, in his name, have offered the Pollock prize of $19,000 for the best maritime life-saving appliance. Not alone life-preservers for individuals, but also numerous devices of wireless telegraphy, to prevent collisions, have been suggested, especially forms of wireless telegraphy, delicate instruments that tell of the approach of a ship when it is yet out of sight in the fog.

We are to study to-day not the wreck of a ship, but of a world, from which not many, but only one way of escape was offered. And let our illustration also remind us how many a wreck of personal character, how many a sorrow we should escape if we would but develop in our consciences "a sensibility to sin, a power to feel it near."

God saw the wickedness (Gen. 6: 5). "In the eyes of the Lord," Noah, though sinful, because repentant and relatively faithful, "found grace," that is, unmerited mercy. He was not "perfect," or "blameless" in the sense of being sinless (9: 21), but only "by faith," having accepted salvation through the death of the Lamb of God, dimly prefigured in the sacrifices he offered (Heb. 11: 7; Gen. 6: 9, 22; 7: 5). But all except his household "did evil in the sight of the Lord." Appetite, Lust, and Greed were the only trinity to which other men bowed in obedience. The grape had been made, through a process of death, a deadly foe to man, rather than a living joy. "The earth was filled with violence" (6: 11) that is, the strong were already oppressing the weak, which God never overlooks. "His eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men" (Ps. 11: 4; Heb. 4: 13; Gen. 16: 13). Let us do only what we know God will be glad to see in the spirit of that child who set out its Noah's ark toys that God might look upon them:

"What are you thinking of, Willie,
Sitting so quietly there,
With your Noah's ark animals round you,
And your eyes gazing up in the air?"

"I have set out my animals, mother,
The great and the small in a row,
With Noah, his wife, and his sons' wives—
They make such a beautiful show.

"I've set them all out in the sunshine
That God, who is up there above,
May see them, because they're so pretty
And I want to show him my love.

"I am sure he must see where I'm sitting,
And hear every word that I say;
Because you know, mother, he listens
Both morning and night, when I pray."

—MARY HOWARD.

I will destroy... come thou and all thy house into the ark (6: 7, 1). Both archæology and geology confirm the Bible story of the flood. In many nations there are legends of such a judgment upon wickedness in the early history of the race, to which the Bible story, free from idolatrous and incongruous interpolations, plainly stands in the relation of original. The tradition most closely resembling the Biblical account is, naturally, that of Assyria, which is in the British Museum, of which Dr. George Smith gave the world a translation a few years ago. He noted the following agreements with the Bible record: 1. That the sinfulness of man was great. 2. That the flood was sent as a punishment for sin. 3. That a man or family were saved in a ship. 4. That the man was directed to construct the vessel according to measurements. 5. That it had only one door and one window. 6. That it was pitched without and within. 7. The seventh, or Sabbath Day, was recognized. 8. The ship rested on a mountain. 9. Birds were sent out to discover if the waters were abated.

God Proclaims Judgment and Mercy

Only a few months ago Prof. G. Fredk. Wright, of Oberlin, one of the foremost geological specialists on the glacial period and the age of man, visited the region of Mt. Ararat, and found much to confirm the Scripture story of the flood, including evidence of a slow subsidence of that whole region, early in the age of man, such as might have engulfed the whole race at that early time. (See other like testimony in Literary Digest, March 23, 1895.) He had previously shown what geologists now generally admit, that there is nothing in the testimony of the rocks to prove a greater antiquity for man than eight to ten thousand years, with which Bible chronology is not inconsistent. Before modern geology was developed, it was shown by Hebrew grammarians that there was nothing in the language used about the flood inconsistent with the idea that it was universal only so far as to include all the inhabited world. But a veteran English geologist, Joseph Prestwich, gives geologic evidence of a recent brief submergence of the whole world (Literary Digest, October 5, 1895).

Another attack of the sceptics, which science itself—the science of arithmetic this time—routs, is the statement that a vessel of the size of the ark, which was that of our very largest ocean liners, could not hold all the known species of animals. Prof. Howard Osgood has shown, to the contrary, that there was more than room enough for two of each kind and seven each of the ten clean animals, 4,000 in all, of the average size of a cat, on one of the three decks, 33,750 square feet, leaving ample room for birds, reptiles, and other forms of life and their food, and for Noah's household, on the other two decks. The cubit is estimated at the lowest figure, eighteen inches, and the number of species at the highest, that of Wallace, 2,415 (Sunday School Times, Feb. 6, 1892).

But we must not linger too long on the proof of the Bible's historic accuracy. The flood was a fact, but also proclaims the truth. It was an acted parable of mercy and judgment (I. Cor. 10: 11), by which God proved, by a judgment day in this world, that he would surely punish unrepentant sinners. Adam and Eve had sinned, thinking he was "too kind to punish," but had learned their error when driven from Paradise. No doubt the Devil used the same sophistry during the hundred and twenty years that Noah pleaded in vain as a "preacher of righteousness" (II. Peter 2: 5), that other families would join his own in the ark of refuge. Knowing that human nature is the same in all ages, we can almost reproduce the sneers, the doubts, the postponements, by which those to whom Noah offered God's mercy, were lost.

The shipwrights lightly jested as they wrought
And asked if that huge vessel were to mount
The hills, or navigate the sandy wastes.

—BICKERSTETH.

A British society has a booklet about one man who would not go into the ark. This "Irak" admitted that very wicked people ought to go in. It is quite possible God might destroy such, but he had lived a "good moral life" and feared nothing. Shem said: "He will destroy everybody who disobeys his command to come into the ark." And Japhet added: "There is room enough for thee, friend Irak, come." Irak answered: "If a righteous man like me was to go in, it would be the same as saying I was as bad as any. I never was stingy or prodigal, or a mocker of parents, like some. I never was the worse for wine in my life, like others." (These were intended for home thrusts at his four friends.) "No; God is just, and

"EVERY LIVING THING WAS DESTROYED, BOTH MAN AND CATTLE"

I have nothing to fear. And if danger does come, I tell you I have a plan of my own. I'll stay near the ark. Thank you all again."

The great door began to swing on its hinges soon after that. Irak knew none of the men or women were near it, for he heard them praying at the time in another part of the building. He thought he saw a hand; the next moment the door was shut.

Irak did not feel so comfortable then. "I have nobody to talk to now, and I would rather talk to these worthy people than to myself. If anything happens, I cannot get in now; that's plain. But I never wanted to go in. When danger comes, either God will do something for me, or I can put my own plan in force."

Days passed, without much change. Then it did come in awful form—clouds, darkness, tempests, torrents of rain, roaring floods! No doubt now! But God did nothing for Irak. "Perhaps," thought he, "God intends me to be saved by the ark just like the rest. Well, I shall be saved by it! How wise I was to stay beside it! How Noah will be astonished to see me as safe as himself when all is over!"

So Irak climbed nimbly on the top of the ark, by one of the ladders still stained with pitch.

The ark floated. Irak tried to be happy. But first he grew cold. Then he grew hungry. "If I had gone in I would have had shelter, food and company. Fool that I was, since I have to be saved by this ark, not to go inside!"

Soon worse thoughts came. "But am I to be saved, after all? The water is rising still. There is not a speck of land to be seen. I am cold and faint with hunger. Ah! these swollen corpses dashing about my feet! Hark!—

'A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.'

"I am lost!" (Prov. 1: 24-26; Rev. 6: 15).

God remembered Noah. "In wrath remember mercy," was an answered prayer for Noah. God said to him as he looked to every father, "Come, thou and thy house into the ark." And with that command and invitation goes the promise of our unbelief so often cuts in at the door.

The Whole Family Saved "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house" (Acts 16: 31-33). A whole family of the sea were wrecked. To anxious friends at last came a telegram from the father, "Saved alone." If he had been "saved alone" because of any selfishness or cowardice which his wife and children were lost, he had better die with them. And "if sorrow in heaven may be," will come to him who, because of his own neglect, finds no love at the Beautiful Gate watching and waiting for him.

But the story of Noah suggests that one may work and faithfully as a "preacher of righteousness" and a few but small results, through no fault of his own. Whence our field of testimony is the wide field of the preach, or mostly confined to the household, let us lay to hear of we have a far greater message than Noah, not of the ment only, but of Jesus. Hear, as the word of one who dead yet speaketh, these words of Dr. Maltbie Babcock at the last Ecumenical Missionary Conference: "What is your chief trust, what your most invaluable talent? It is your personal knowledge of Jesus Christ. I am tired of an account before my Master for what I did in this world, with what I knew about him. Do not doubt it. 'What shall I do with Jesus that is called the Christ?' rather, 'What am I doing now with Jesus that is called the Christ?'"

And let us not fail to find in the story of the animals brought to the ark a suggestion of that mercy to animals that is reaching from domestic to wild animals and making many a man, once a "mighty hunter," ashamed to have found sport in needless killing of God's creatures.

Col. John Sobieski tells this story of one of his hunting trips: "Sauntering leisurely along under tall elms, I heard a bird singing, and looking up, I saw a wee bird perched upon a lofty limb, singing very sweetly. Without a moment's thought, and without the slightest idea that I could hit so small a mark (for I had none of the spirit of murder in my heart), I unbanged away. I saw some feathers fall and the little songster came dropping down from branch to branch, and fell at my feet. I stooped down and picked it up. It is a tiny little thing, not much bigger than my thumb, of a yellowish-green color, as beautiful as it could be. Then, like a flash, the thought came upon me: 'What a contemptible deed I have done. Here was one of God's beautiful creatures that has just as much right to existence as I, and I have doubtless, was as sweet to it as mine was to me, and at that very moment that I was singing its beautiful songs to make the world more pleasant and glorious, and I have brutally shot it to death.'

"I carefully buried it among the lilies, and then promised myself that I would never again wantonly destroy life.

"I regard this the greatest crime ever committed."

Let any one who finds sport in shooting deer, read The Trail of the Sandhill.

And right here, we may well ponder the story of the birds sent forth when the flood had abated. The raven that could feed on carrion came not back but twice at intervals of seven days (which suggests that the abatement was already established), the dove came back, finding no place of rest. It was his, no doubt, that led David to write, "Return, my soul, unto thy Noah," the word "rest" being that in the original.

On the dove's second return it brought an olive leaf, a symbol of peace, and, going forth again, found no need to return, for the flood had so abated that it could rest once more on the earth.

So on the uplands somewhere—not on the icy top of Mt. Ararat but on some green slope of the lower hills—the ark rested and Noah's household brought sacrifices of thanksgiving for deliverance.

The distinguished astronomer, Richard A. Proctor, shortly before his death made a map of the stars as they appeared 3400 B.C., and was so led to believe that the signs of the Zodiac then originated in an effort to picture in the stars the story of the flood, Capricornus, Aquarius, Pisces, etc., Argo being the ark. (Zion's Herald, September 26, 1888.)

After the flood, the rainbow not first seen but adopted as God's seal that he would not again destroy the race by a flood. As in Revelation it is the "rainbow round about the throne," the sign of divine kingship, of justice tempered with mercy as rain is transfigured with sunlight.

The rainbow seems indeed a glimpse of Christ's crown, who will come again to reign over a redeemed world. "In the days of Noah" so shall it be at that coming (Matt. 24: 38, 39), the few ready, the many indifferent or sleeping. Meantime mercy's door is not yet shut. It is not an ocean of wrath but an ocean of love that stretches before us.

There's a wideness in God's mercy
Like the wideness of the sea;
There is a kindness in his justice
Which is more than liberty.

Daisies in the Desert

WHEN we think of the desert, there comes before our mental eye a picture of hot sand, treeless, and blank of other color than the wilderness dust can show, and we pity the travelers who must fare across the great weary spaces, yearning for the palm-trees that spring up in the oasis. An oasis is a green place in the desert, green because there is a well of water there which fertilizes the waste. All the imagery of the Old Testament shows us how much the pastures depended upon water, how greatly the people dreaded being without it. The good man is to flourish like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in her season. Forty years the Hebrews, emerging from slavery in Egypt, wandered through the wilderness, until one generation had passed away, and the impression of those days of going to and fro, of the march and the tent, never left them in their subsequent history. Yet their prophets, recalling it to their memory, ever reminded them of God's goodness, and told them that the Lord would feed them in fat pastures, and give them springs and fountains.

To add to the beauty of an oasis, with its palms tender and graceful, its herbage and fruits, what could be needed to give a final touch so exquisite, as a field of daisies in bloom? Their cheery sturdy growth, their white and gold, their wondrous and lavish profusion, make daisies favorites with us all. Here, in America, the children are wild with joy when they are let loose amid a riot of daisies in the meadow, picking as many as they choose, yet leaving a host behind them. As children, the world over, are the same, whether they have dusky skins or white, we may be sure that in Africa there is just as much pleasure as here, when the little folks go to seek this treasure-trove.

The daisies bring messages of comfort to shut-in people, and to the sick, when kind flower missionaries carry them in bunches to the hospitals. Illness is itself a sort of desert experience, and when flowers are brought to the bedside of the suffering, they come with the breath of the oasis, a cool breath to fan fevered brows, a tonic breath to hearten the weak.

But the most charming quality about daisies, after all, is their freedom, their exuberant growth, and the countless numbers in which they troop to clothe the meadows with grace and pomp. In midsummer no hedge or fence surrounds and bars our path to them. They are spreading their cloth of gold on the upland and the lowland, their wealth of beauty is for the beggar and the pauper and the little child, and yet they are not out of place nor despised in the palace. Beautiful daisies; beautiful everywhere; most beautiful of all in the desert.

I came, as I walked through this world of ours,
Where often the briers are more than the flowers;
To a place that was bright as the sunbeams crossed,
A space where the daisies were zephyr-tossed;
The bees had found it, the birds were there,
And the perfume was rich in the summer air.

I had borne that day a heavy heart,
For the cares of life were my weary part:
Sorrow had touched me with chilling hand,
And the earth was a wan and desert land.
But lo! as a spell to banish gloom,
The daisies came with their happy bloom.

None can be sad where the daisies lift
Their cheery faces, where odors drift,
Sweet with honey across her way:
Roses and lilies and new-mown hay;
All the scents of the summer blent
With the daisies and clover, until content
One steps o'er the desert, here and there Resting within an oasis fair.

For the God who brings the daisies here,
Ever will cherish his children dear.

The Teacher's Vacation

The universal closing of the schools in summer gives an opportunity for rest, not to the children only, but to a class of very earnest and faithful workers, the teachers, who find themselves very tired at the year's end. To an outsider, it sometimes looks as though the teachers had comparatively short hours of labor, but it must be remembered that their work is intense and exhausting while it lasts, and there are many hours of toil, after the children have been dismissed for the day. Papers and work of different kinds are piled on the teacher's desk for examination in the afternoon or the evening, and there is also much to do in the way of study and preparation for the coming day. When vacation arrives, the little school ma'am is quite ready for it, and our blessing accompanies her as she starts to spend her holiday in the country, to go to the Pan-American Exposition, or to visit friends in some distant city.

Womanly Touchiness

It has lately been recorded that certain American women, a year ago, at Peking, took offense at an American naval officer, because he did not oblige his men, worn out for want of sleep, to rise and salute the ladies whenever they happened to pass. The pettiness of temper which could notice so small a slight in circumstances so grave, illustrates a fault of feminine character which should be amended. Women are apt to be oversensitive about their dignity, in other words, they are touchy. They exact attention on the score of their sex, and are needlessly annoyed when some gallantry which they prize, is withheld. In business, women are gradually learning to be indifferent to mere courtesy, and to go on with their work, whether or not men extend to them the gentle observances of the drawing-room. The ladies at Peking knew nothing of business, and even in time of siege, expected the marines to acknowledge their queenly presence. Fortunately, their childishness did no permanent injury to a brave and self-denying officer, who received his promotion just as if he had not fallen foul of some inimical gentlemen.

Women, without exception, however, manifest an amazing toleration for certain encroachments of men, which they might with propriety resent. "Ladies' Cabin" is a conspicuous legend in our ferry-boats. If this means anything, it means that ladies are entitled to the occupancy of seats in the part of the boat appropriated to them, but men push and crowd women aside, seize the vacant places, and calmly read their newspapers, oblivious to the fact that women are standing near; old women, delicate women, yes, and sometimes, women with babes in arms. Not touchiness, but justice, prompts indignation at this common boorishness of the stronger sex.

FOLLOWING JESUS

WHO fain would follow Jesus
A daily cross must bear,
With never ceasing patience,
With vigilance and prayer.

Who fain would follow Jesus,
The Master's life must heed,
Must spend himself for others,
And help a brother's need.

Who'er shall follow Jesus
Through strife and shame and death,
Shall sit at length with him on high,
Where love enthroneth faith.

For here the cross of Jesus,
And there the crown and palm;
And here the storm and tempest
And there, the endless calm.

Early Engagements

VERY young people, deeply in love, as they imagine, think it very hard that their seniors counsel them against an early engagement or a precipitate marriage. They are so convinced that life without each other will be a barren and wretched waste and failure, that they sometimes handicap their future by indiscreet vows. At seventeen a man is immature; a girl is a trifle less undeveloped; but even she is not as yet prepared for matrimony. Twenty-five on the man's side is usually young enough for betrothal, and twenty-two is the corresponding age which is the youthful limit for a woman.

Never should people seriously consider marriage—and an engagement is the high road to marriage—until they are in circumstances to support a home. A lad who has his living to make, but who has as yet succeeded only in gaining the lowest round of the ladder, should wait for an assured income before he asks a girl to engage herself to him. A small income will do, but he should have something definite. A youth who is in college, with his profession still to acquire, would far better defer an engagement till he is some years further on the road.

Small Savings

Over the sea, in the beautiful land of France, the homely virtue of thrift flourishes, and families are very careful about small savings. When a daughter is born, her parents begin to lay aside something for her dot or dowry, so that she shall not go empty-handed to the house of her husband. In most foreign countries, among people of good estate, some provision is settled upon a woman at her marriage. So that in the event of ill-fortune, she and her children shall not be plunged into utter poverty.

It would be well if here, in our bountiful country, we prized small savings more, had more respect for economy, and trained our girls, so that when married, they should be real helps to their husbands. And there is a great difference between frugality and miserly hoarding of pence and shillings. To save for the sake of accumulation is one thing. To save that we may be honest, that we may be liberal, and that we may have to bestow on others, is another and a nobler thing. A pastor in New York, one day last winter said, when taking up a collection for the poor: "It is better to give than to receive!" Then, he paused. "Yes," he said, "It is better to have wherewith to give, than to be obliged to receive."

AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON'S CATCH-ALL

—ETHEL. A book would be an appropriate gift to your cousin on his graduating from the High School.

—THERESA. Teach your little daughter to say, "Yes, Aunt Susie," if you object to "Yes, Ma'am," which I like very much in small chicks like your wee Minnie.

—LASSIE. Bi-carbonate of soda, common baking-soda, is said to be a good dentifrice. A little pinch used daily will, we are told, preserve the teeth and sweeten the breath.

—JOHN HENRY. A man follows a woman down the aisle in church, but precedes her in leaving a street car, where she may need assistance in alighting. Of course a man carries a lady's bundles if she will permit him to do so.

THE PAN-AMERICAN BIBLE STUDY CONGRESS

Important Programme of the Notable Body which Meets July 17-31

BY JONATHAN I. SLATER, SECRETARY OF THE CONGRESS

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

AMONG the many attractions of the Pan-American Exposition, probably none will hold so deep an interest for searchers after Divine truth as the Bible Study Congress, which will meet in City Convention Hall, Buffalo, from July 17 to July 31. This project is the result of several public meetings held in Buffalo, in September, 1900. It has been planned to conduct a carefully-arranged series of sessions for the discussion of principles and methods of Bible study and Bible teaching and related topics, and to make a fair and just comparison of the various methods of Bible study now in use, each to be considered strictly upon its merits, without fear, favor or prejudice. This Congress will furnish an opportunity to all who love and revere the Word of God of freely exchanging views with reference to the betterment of Bible study. The movement is non-partisan, non-sectarian and non-ecclesiastical. It is under the management of a Board of Directors at Buffalo, the president of which is Mr. William G. Justice, and its efforts are supplemented by an Auxiliary Board, the chairman of which is Rev. C. R. Blackall, D.D., of Philadelphia. Many of the members of the Board are representatives of leading religious and secular educational institutions.

The programme includes Bible study and teaching in the home, the church, public and preparatory schools, colleges and universities, and Bible study will be considered from every point of view. Bible school workers, from the Atlantic to far beyond the Mississippi, have given notice of their purpose to attend. No charge will be made for admission to the sessions of the Congress, the expenses of which are being met by voluntary contributions. The brilliant phalanx of speakers, thirty-eight in number, belonging to sixteen different religious denominations, and coming from many States and countries, will certainly afford an opportunity which workers cannot afford to pass unused. Why our Churches and Sunday Schools have not more spiritual life and power is a question that is engaging the thoughts of many true followers of Christ. May not the chief reason be because they are ceasing to feed on the Word of God—the heavenly manna given to nourish our souls? Worldliness in many forms, and light and trashy literature, have crowded out Bible reading and Bible study. Go into our Christian homes on the Lord's Day, and what are the members reading? The Book which is a lamp under their feet and a light unto their path? Alas, no! The Sunday newspaper reports of trade, the weekly magazine, the latest novel, have, in many instances, taken its place. How are we to live inspired lives if we do not keep in touch with the teachings of the inspired Book?

One of the most serious problems in the twentieth century is how to best utilize in religious training the methods now in vogue in secular education. History proves the power of the Bible to civilize, and scores of noted men have testified to the value of the Bible fearlessly saying that to its teaching, in the way of culture and refinement, they owe more than to any other book, or to the influence of any college or university. The science of pedagogy, systematic and common sense methods of training and preparation should be employed as powerful helps in our Bible Schools. Experts in secular education have long claimed that the general standard of instruction of the young in our Bible Schools should be materially raised to entitle the work to the respect its due.

It is believed there is a general awakening on the part of Christian people in regard to Bible study, and certainly no time could be more fitting than when people from all parts of Pan America and from the "islands of the sea" are coming to celebrate the unprecedented achievements of a century of growth and development in material prosperity. It is most fitting that the Bible study of whose principles has made possible these achievements, should at the time of this celebration and at the opening of the new century, receive special consideration.

"WE'RE GOING TO MONT-LAWN"

AT the time of this writing, two big rooms in the Bible House are full of little candidates for Mont-Lawn, and the company has overflowed into the hall, where expectant groups may be seen waiting their turn for examination by the doctor. The missionaries who brought the children to the Bible House, and several ladies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff are in charge of the company; a number of caretakers from Mont-Lawn are in waiting to take the tots down the elevator to the street-cars, in which they ride to the river, where they take the steamer for Nyack, reaching Mont-Lawn in time for supper.

This examination by the doctor is a very important matter in the eyes of the children. As each tot's name is called, he or she passes behind the screen, and into professional hands, with a serious and anxious countenance, usually to emerge a few seconds later, beaming with smiles. Only when a waif gives evidence of a contagious trouble is it otherwise. In the latter case, advice is given, and the little one bidden to try again. Seventy-nine children go up to Mont-Lawn in this party. Yesterday a like number went up. Tomorrow forty-five make the journey.

How very happy they look! and how glad are the missionaries and the poor parents who have brought them to the Bible House. Many are very neat. The missionaries tidied them before they came; their parents, too, did what was possible. But some haven't any bundle; every garment they possess is on their backs. A little hunchback lad is in the crowd. "He didn't have a whole suit of clothes," said the missionary who brought him. "He had almost nothing on. We had to dress him. Two other little boys in my party came to the church this morning wearing one garment each—a girl's slip. It was all their mother could put on them. The mother of that little girl over there is a widow—a worthy woman—whom we are trying to send to a hospital to undergo a serious surgical operation—the only thing that can cure her. She has three children and absolutely nothing with which to support them." And so this missionary and that gives you the sad histories of children he or she has brought.

WAITING FOR THE MONT-LAWN MISSIONARY

And meanwhile tots are bubbling over with joyous anticipation, and right and left you hear the soft murmurings of their watchword of delight: "We're going to Mont-Lawn! We're going to Mont-Lawn!"

There is much sickness in the tenements. The hot waves have swept many little ones down. When strong men collapse on the street from heat, and people living in big roomy houses are overcome, how must it be in over-crowded tenement quarters, in sweltering alleys and ill-smelling courts? "It is a blessed thing that you are taking the children out of Mont-Lawn now," say the missionaries. "The conditions in tenement homes are heart-breaking." In one day—June 28, practically the beginning of the hot term—there were four deaths, and thirty prostrations from heat reported in New York. How many unreported cases, those in obscure tenement homes, there were, no one knows.

Children often present themselves at the Bible House in heavy garments. The mother has borrowed from neighbors, and drawn upon her children's own stock of winter and summer raiment, and the arrayed her little people for the trip the best she can in these odd and ends. The appearance of small folk in such garb when the thermometer is climbing past the hundreds would be amusing were not so pathetic. The picture which we give is not unlike what benevolent workers have seen when entering a tenement room to gather up a crowd for Mont-Lawn.

A missionary found in her letter box recently, a number of poor little notes on miserable scraps of paper, reading like this: "Can't my sister go to Mont-Lawn? The hot weather makes her head ache. She can't etc." "Please, we've moved and our room is smaller and it was. We can't sleep nights it so hot. Please can't we go to the country? We'll be good;" signed with half a dozen names. "I send one waif to Mont-Lawn for ten days costs only $3; $6 sends two; $9 sends three; $12 four; $15 five; $30 makes ten happy; for $60 a whole colony can have an outing. This outing means the saving of life itself to many drooping child. Will you not help us save the children of the tenements? They suffer more than you know."

Found Christ in Boyhood

HOW PROFESSOR R. E. HUDSON, THE SINGING EVANGELIST, CAME TO BE A CHRISTIAN

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

It is impossible to compute how much we owe the men who write our songs, and arrange the fresh, new tunes that meet the wants of our souls and give voice to our confidence in faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Prof. R. E. Hudson has given many an hymn a new setting, and many a new hymn the setting of its own, which has been blessed of God to be a message

Christ in our daily lives he will fight all our battles for us.

While the meeting was to be in their church, and those who controlled the church had been won over to believe in the genuineness of the people who were going to conduct the revival meetings, young Hudson feared that his mother would neither go herself nor allow him to go. But when the time came, the mother took him to the meeting. Now his desire was gratified. He had never heard anything but psalms sung, and those to the dull old tunes that had never aroused the dormant musical faculty that was in him. The new hymns and tunes which young Hudson heard at that revival meeting were the greatest treat he had ever had in his life up to that time. He says he can never forget the marvelous joy of it. For weeks afterward he thought of that service, but did not expect to ever be permitted to attend another Methodist meeting.

About seven months afterward, the Methodists were to dedicate a church about four miles from Hudson's home in the country. A neighbor who belonged to the church asked the boy's mother to allow him to go with them to the dedication, and she consented. Now his desire to see and hear these wonderful revivalists was once more gratified. The meeting began on Friday evening. On Saturday evening, at the close of the sermon, a very earnest appeal was made to all who were not Christians to go forward to the "Mourner's Bench" and give themselves to Christ. It seemed to young Hudson that every drop of blood in his veins wanted to go; but he was only twelve years old, and he was timid, and backward, and perhaps would not have gone, had not a little girl, about his own age, who was his schoolmate, timidly stepped over to where he was and asked him to go. He just needed that word of encouragement, and he went forward and gave his heart to God, and dedicated his life to what has been a most happy and joyous service of the Lord.

Close of a Useful Life

CHRISTIAN people, the world over, will hear with sincere regret that the famous orator and public teacher, known as Rev. Joseph Cook, has ended his labors. He died June 25, at his summer home, in Ticonderoga, N. Y. It appears from the old Harvard catalogues that Dr. Cook had been named after the ancient Jewish historian, Flavius Josephus, but when he commenced his public work he dropped the cognomen, and signed himself simply Joseph Cook. He was born on a farm at Ticonderoga, N. Y., in 1838, and from his earliest years was noted for his passion for learning. It is told of him that when his father, desiring to reward him for some boyish service, offered him the choice of a gold watch or an encyclopædia, the boy unhesitatingly chose the latter. His early education was acquired at Phillips' Academy, whence he went to Yale College. But his health failing, he left that institution before completing his course. Two years later, however, he had sufficiently recovered to resume his studies, and he entered Harvard, from which, in 1865, he graduated with high honors. He then proceeded to Andover for the study of theology. He took high rank there in moral philosophy, and was licensed to preach. His ambition for erudition, however, was not yet satisfied; so he spent several years at Heidelberg, and other German universities. At the close of the brother from the King to his lost child. "Here's a Golden Day," "I Wandered Aay from My Father's House," "My Love, My Love I Give to Thee," "Jesus, the Light of the World," and scores of others have found not only the words but the tune in his devoted Christian mind at heart, while such tunes as "The Half Is Never Yet Been Told," "A Little Talk with Jesus," and "Blessed Name," have flown over all boundaries and are sung in all folds.

Professor Hudson's parents were members of the Seceder Church, and in the early days of his boyhood he was not permitted to go to the meetings of other Christians. When he was eleven years old, the Methodists held a protracted meeting in the town where his people lived, and as they were a despised people in those days, Master Hudson was not allowed to go to the meetings; but during that revival, a man who was known as very wicked was converted, and it was the talk of the town. The boy went over to see how a man looks when he is converted. He had never met the old man before when he was not using profane language, but on this morning he once began to tell Rev. Christ had saved him. He looked so changed that the young man had a great curiosity to see the people who brought about such a transformation in this hard-hearted and profane old man.

A year passed, and the same Methodist preacher came back to hold another protracted meeting. It is a wonderful testimony to the power of genuine Christianity, when revealed in human lives, to overcome all prejudice and conquer the minds of hearts of the people, that when the preacher, who had been so despised a year ago, came back to the town, he was invited to hold meetings in the Seceder church, the church whose members would have nothing to do with him a year before. The people who had been converted the year before had conquered all opposition by their changed and transformed lives. That is the best way of breaking down religious prejudice. If we live year 1873 he returned to this country, and sought a position in which he could turn to the best account the learning and culture he had acquired.

Early in 1875, he commenced that series of Monday afternoon lectures in Tremont Temple, Boston, which made him famous at home and abroad. They dealt with an immense variety of subjects, political, religious, and scientific. They were published after delivery in many newspapers, and afterwards collected in book form, and were translated into several European languages. Audiences of upwards of three thousand persons assembled to listen to them, and they were eagerly read in foreign lands. They were continued for fourteen years with never-waning popularity. In 1880, Dr. Cook suspended the course to make an extended tour of the world, during which he visited the great European capitals, and lectured also in India, China and Japan. On his return he resumed his labors, and continued them until two years ago, when he was laid aside by the illness which has now proved fatal.

The Virginia Flood Sufferers

FROM a lady residing in Cedar Bluff, Tazewell county, Va., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received this letter, appealing for aid for the poor people in that section, who lost practically all their belongings in the recent unprecedented freshet:

My husband is a minister in this town. We had a severe freshet here last week, and many lost their homes, while the fences, gardens, etc., were largely destroyed. Several families lost their all, and are really in destitute circumstances. The loss is heavy and prospects gloomy, as so many crops were swept away. Could you help us by a contribution? Cedar Bluff is located on Clinch River, in the mountains of Southwest Virginia, and we were in the midst of that severe cloudburst. My husband, Rev. R. T. Webb, is pastor of the M. E. Church South at this place, and a member of the Holston Conference. Our town numbers about 450 people, and fifty per cent. of this number are very poor. Some who did not lose their homes, lost all their provisions and their household furniture is severely damaged, covered with water and mud. Water flooded the church, as well as a great many homes, and the floor is warped and carpets badly soiled. We would be very grateful if you let this letter receive your immediate attention, and we will all appreciate any assistance.

MRS. R. T. WEBB.

We cordially commend this appeal to the benevolence of our readers. Here is a field, near at hand, in which Christian Endeavor Bands, Epworth League Circles, and Sunshine Circles could do much good by taking it up as their own special work, and operating through Mrs. R. T. Webb, the writer of this letter, who is a reliable person.

A Greeting from South America

From San Andres, in the U. S. of Colombia, a subscriber, D. M. Hoepman, writes: "I have been a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for several years. It is to me a very valuable paper and brings peace and joy. I believe it does more towards Christianizing the world than any other book or paper except the Holy Bible."

A STIMULANT.

And a Sorry Friend to Some Systems.

"Coffee acts as a stimulant to me. I can for a time accomplish considerable more work, but then I am dull, spiritless, nervous, weak and irritable. Coffee acts like a slow poison on my father, giving him inward pains and a feeling of being generally upset. Continued use always used to make him ill."

"He used to be very fond of the beverage, and was in the habit of drinking it two mornings, say, then skipping a few days and taking it two mornings again. If he took it the third morning, he was invariably sick. It is two years now since we had the first package of Postum. We have been using it ever since, to our very great benefit."

"A lady friend, who is the wife of a prominent clergyman in New Haven (whose name I am not at liberty to give), was a complete nervous wreck from the use of coffee. About a year ago she began the use of Postum and continued it. Six weeks after starting she had lost all her former nervousness, had grown plump in the face, and her health better than it had been for years. She is a splendid walking advertisement, and is most enthusiastic in the praise of Postum, telling all of her callers of its merits and urging them to try it. Kate Austen, Hamden, Conn."

An Early Christian Hero*

WHEN we study the New Testament, we find language which is like steel that cannot grow dull with use, and we find teaching which burns and moves like fire. We must not expect that the successors of the apostles should always be able to pierce and kindle in the same fashion. Those whose writings have been preserved for us have the same purpose as their predecessors, but not often the same power. And yet they are men who have learnt the meaning of religion, and planted in their very thought of religion is their thought of Christ. So their work is effective although it is not creative. They were able to show the pagan world what honor and modesty were inspired by the worship of Jesus, or to show that Judaism, without Christ, is but a broken torso.

Polycarp is typical of a stage of progress in the Church, and his personality is very near and real to us. He is first known to us in the letter written to him by Ignatius,—a forcible letter, giving the younger bishop plenty of good advice, telling him that "it is not every wound that is cured by the same plaster, and bidding him be sober, "as God's own athlete ought to be." Against false teaching he is to be "firm as a beaten anvil."

Polycarp seems to have been to Smyrna in the autumn of 154. He had not been among those hot spirits who had considered it a virtue to seek for a martyrdom, but he became compromised by the action of others. A Phrygian, named Quintus, came to Smyrna, and with the proverbial fanaticism of Phrygians, provoked the interference of the magistrates. In company with eleven Smyrnaeans and Philadelphians he was imprisoned. At the sight of the wild beasts Quintus recanted, but the rest died amid hideous atrocities. Among them was a youth named Germanicus, whom the proconsul begged to renounce his religion. The youth replied by enticing a wild beast to free him from the world and its temptations. The mob was infuriated at the sight of his heroism, and shouted for Polycarp. The good bishop had wished to stay at home, but at the entreaties of his friends had withdrawn to a little villa in the neighborhood. But a slave boy, who was captured and tortured by the police, betrayed the new hiding-place. Polycarp met his pursuers calmly; talked with the police, offered them food and drink, and asked for one hour in which to say his prayers.

The next day he was taken to the town on an ass. Herod, the inspector of the police, met him and invited him to come into his chariot. He then said it would only be necessary to say "Cæsar is Lord," and offer sacrifice. Polycarp said that he would never do it, and was then pushed out of the chariot. He was conducted to the athletic grounds, which may still be traced on the slope of Mount Pagus. Amid the shouts of the populace the bishop was brought before the proconsul, Titus Statius Quadratus.

"Revoke Christ," said Quadratus.—"Eighty and six years have I been in the service of Christ," said Polycarp, "and he has never done me wrong; how then can I blaspheme him now, my King and my Saviour?" With dignity he declared that he was a Christian, and said that Christians were commanded to pay honor to authority, but he refused absolutely to give divine honor to Cæsar, or to defend himself before the crowd.

The Asiarch Philip was then asked to give Polycarp to the lions. Philip replied that he had no authority to do this, as the wild beast shows were now over. So they shouted for fire, and in an instant Jews and pagans brought a pile of faggots collected in neighboring shops and baths. Polycarp undressed himself, and said that God would help him to stand quiet at the stake, without being nailed there in the ordinary fashion. Then he prayed, thanking God:

Thou hast thought me worthy of this day, and of this hour, that I should be suffered to have my part in the number of thy martyrs, to drink of the cup of thy Christ. . . . I praise thee, I bless thee, I glorify thee through the eternal and heavenly High Priest, Jesus Christ, thy beloved Son, through whom with him and the Holy Spirit be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

The faggots were lighted, but the fire was whipped by the wind into a curving bow of flame around the martyr. The crowd saw that he was not burning fast enough, so they made the executioner thrust him through with a sword.

Thus he died, Polycarp the unoriginal, whom the heathen named "the father of the Christians."

The Spirit of the Hive*

AFTER the queen's recognition, when flowers begin to close sooner, and open later, the spirit of the hive one morning will coolly decree the simultaneous and general massacre of every male. It regulates the workers' labors with due regard to their age; it allots their task to the nurses who attend the nymphs and the larvæ; the ladies of honor who wait on the queen and never allow her out of their sight; the house-bees, who air, refresh, or heat the hive by fanning their wings, and hasten the evaporation of the honey that may be too highly charged with water; the architects, masons, wax-workers, and sculptors, who form the chain and construct the combs; the foragers, who sally forth to the flowers in search of the nectar that turns into honey, of the pollen, that feeds the nymphs and the larvæ; the propolis, that welds and strengthens the buildings of the city, or the water and salt required by the youth of the nation. Its orders have gone to the chemists, who insure the preservation of the honey by letting a drop of formic acid fall in from the end of their sting; to the capsule-makers, who seal down the cells when the treasure is ripe; to the sweepers, who maintain public places and streets most irreproachably clean; to the bearers, whose duty it is to remove the corpses, and to the amazons of the guard, who keep watch on the threshold by night and by day, question comers and goers, recognize the novices, who return from their very first flight, scare away vagabonds, marauders and loiterers, expel all intruders, attack redoubtable foes in a body, and, if need be, barricade the entrance.

Finally, it is "the spirit of the hive" that fixes the hour of the great annual sacrifice to the genius of the race: the hour, that is, of the swarm; when we find a whole people, who have attained the topmost pinnacle of prosperity and power, suddenly abandoning to the generation to come their wealth and their palaces, their homes and the fruits of their labor; themselves content to encounter the hardships and perils of a new and distant country. This act, be it conscious or not, undoubtedly passes the limits of human morality. Its results will sometimes be ruin, but poverty always; and the thrice-happy city is scattered abroad in obedience to a law superior to its own happiness. Where has this law been decreed, which is by no means as blind and inevitable as one might believe? Where, in what assembly, what council, what intellectual and moral sphere, does this "spirit" reside, to whom all must submit, itself being vassal to an heroic duty, to an intelligence whose eyes are persistently fixed on the future?

Called to be a Winner of Souls

BY REV. S. T. WILLIS

THE Reverend Charles Reign Scoville, of Chicago, Illinois, though a young man, is one of the most successful evangelists in America. During the last nine years he has devoted himself exclusively to evangelistic work among the Disciples of Christ, and has achieved remarkable results, as shown by additions to the Church, following his great meetings in various cities in Illinois, Ohio,

Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Texas, Missouri, Oregon, Iowa. His last meetings, at Des Moines, held in the three churches there, aggregating in results 1,246 additions to the churches in that city, is the largest meeting ever held by the Disciples of Christ, notwithstanding the fact they are noted in the history of evangelism for the great revivals they have conducted. Evangelist Scoville's entrance into the ministry is due to a small incident, which shows what wonderful things may come from a little word of encouragement, fitly spoken. Fifteen years ago, when he was a lad of sixteen, he confessed Christ at his home town of Butler, Ind. The following day he arose in the little church, and endeavored to express the joy that filled his heart at that time. He tried three times to say what was in his heart, but failed ignominiously each time, and sat down in shame and confusion. At last, desperate over his failure, he said: "I hope the day will come when I shall be able to say what I have been unable to say here to-night." The pastor of the church was the Rev. I. W. Lowman (who afterward became the pastor of James A. Garfield), solemnly replied: "May the Lord make that boy a preacher!" Mr. Scoville says, "I have never forgotten those words, nor the tone in which they were uttered. From that night, in that little church, I date my career as a preacher of the Gospel of Christ. In that little church years after, I held a meeting, in which, by the grace of God, 214 souls became obedient to the faith." He leads a very busy life. Perhaps no banker, millionaire, oil king, attorney, merchant, physician or other business man labors more unceasingly than a faithful evangelist needs must. While in Des Moines Mr. Scoville received within two months calls for sixty-six evangelistic meetings elsewhere—one of these invitations was from England, another from Honolulu.

Evangelist Scoville was born on a farm near Hewville, Ind., October 14, 1869, and when a small boy he drove a milk wagon to earn money during the summer to help keep himself in school in winter. His parents possessing but limited means, he was compelled to work his way not only through high-school, but through college as well. In course of time he graduated from the Tri-State Normal College of Indiana, and afterward from Hiram College, Ohio. During five years he completed the seven years' college course, and in his preaching reached over 1,000 people with the gospel of salvation. For a while he taught and was on the staff of lecturers of the Western Reserve Bureau, but it was not long until he decided to devote his whole time to evangelical work.

STRONG WEAK MAN*

Temptation Which is Stronger Than Human Strength

VERY familiar in every age has been the spectacle of physical strength combined with moral weakness. There is evidently nothing in the flesh which can aid the spirit in attaining the supremacy which alone can secure the proper order in the human kingdom. We know well that a weak and deplorable body may affect the mind, narrowing its horizon and souring its attitude. It frequently happens that the body is maimed, or deformed, or racked with constant pain, cripples the mind and produces a temper malignant and vindictive. We know, too, that there have been many instances of the contrary effect. There have been chambers which seemed almost the gate of heaven, by reason of the patient and cheerfulness of a sufferer, who seemed uplifted by pain into the very presence of God. Close as is the connection between soul and body, there is a possibility of such independent action as to make the contrast astonishing. The idea of a sound mind in a sound body is one not attained so often as we might expect. The strong mind triumphing over the infirmities of the body and the robust body dragging the mind through the slime of vice and degradation are the common spectacle. Who has not seen a man of vigorous physique and charming presence yielding to the seductions of the intoxicating cup and the long train of temptation with which it is associated? The voraciousness of animal life and animal spirit seems to prepare the way for moral obliquity. It is as if the stronger partner in the combination asserted its right to rule and the man becomes a mere animal, or spiritual being akin to the angels, according to the relative force of the body or the soul.

There is an old legend of the Weir-woman, disguised as a beautiful woman, lured the outskirts of towns and enticed young men to her den, where she slew them. In the second and seventh chapters of Proverbs, Solomon draws a vivid picture of the temptation which the weaver represents. His own life furnishes a sad illustration of its truth. The Christian says briefly that his wives turned away his heart, and we read with sorrow of his career, which opened so brilliantly, ended in sin and gloom. Like Satan, the strongest man, Solomon, the wisest man, yielded to this temptation. It seems to be no power in human nature that can be a bulwark against it. In our own day we have seen a patriotic statesman, a man who did more than any of his predecessors to satisfy the natural ambition of his country, come to the very vesper of success, and there, just as the goal of a hundred years of struggle seemed to be near attainment, ruin himself and disappoint the hope of his people through the sinful love of a woman. Again and again have statesmen, judges, and even ministers of the Gospel, fallen in this way. And the other sex has a still longer list of victims. The pride of the father's house, the light of his home, the lovely and beloved wife and mother, have yielded to the tempter, to their own undoing, and have brought shame and heartbreak to the families. Our divorce courts bear shameful testimony to the prevalence of the evil which brought Samson to blindness and suicide. Our police courts reek with the public manifestation of it in its coarsest form, and our Magdalen institution struggle vainly to rescue the victims. Both legislation and philanthropy are impotent in the battle against it, and the victims of both sexes are going down by thousands every year to their ruin. There is no sign yet that people are learning the lesson which is being illustrated in all our cities, that in that sin is the surest of all ways to death of body and soul.

Must we then despair of overcoming the gigantic evil? With the power that Christ places in our hands we ought not to despair of anything. But that power must be used in the earliest stages of education. The Christian parent must understand that his beloved child will be assailed by temptation. The very qualities which intensify his affection for his child are those which will make it all the more liable to assault. The case of Samson shows that physical vigor will be no protection, and the case of Solomon shows that the armor of wisdom and knowledge is vulnerable. There is no power but the grace of Christ that can fortify the heart. The child ought to be warned and care ought to be taken that the insidious temptation should find its assault foreseen and the citadel fortified for resistance. The child should be cautioned against idleness, the surest ally of the tempter; cautioned also against intoxicating liquor, which always prepares the way to a fall; and cautioned against dallying with temptation, which surely ends in yielding. Such preparation may do much in enabling the child to win the victory when the time of struggle comes, but it is only when the heart is given to Christ that there is a prospect of safety. The love of him who is able to keep us from falling is the surest remedy for this, as for all other forms of sin. It is in spiritual, as it is in physical matters, "Like cures like." The love which, unregulated, is the beginning of the trouble, is little likely to stray into wrong paths when it has been pre-empted and in its highest and controlling form has been given to Christ. "The expulsive power of the new affection" has delivered many who after falling victims to the sin have turned to Christ; how much better when the heart is occupied by love of him before the demons who are plotting ruin have effected an entrance.

THE SAVED HOUSEHOLD

Deliverance for the People who Served God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN the early days of the world's history the great enemy of souls, who had got a foothold upon earth through the sin of our first parents, set himself in every way to corrupt mankind, and he succeeded only too well. Things had come to such a pass that "the Lord saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart."

"And the Lord said, I will destroy (or marg., 'blot out') man whom I have created from the face of the ground; both man, and beast, and creeping thing, and fowl of the air; for it repented me that I have made them." What a moment! God had made man in his image after his likeness, and man had turned his back on the holy God. And God's Spirit must be withdrawn, and only judgment could follow upon those created for his glory! But there was one man to whom God could speak and find response. "Noah walked with God" (Gen. 6: 9); he did nothing, said nothing, thought nothing, which could separate him from God; he was continually and fully at God's disposal. To such a man God can speak. And, oh how touching it is that God would not destroy the earth until he had spoken to Noah! "God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth." And then he immediately spoke to Noah of a way of escape for him and for his family. "Make thou an ark," etc. He gave Noah the proportions of the ark, told him what the material should be, and directed that only one window should be made, and that should be at the top; that Noah might not be occupied with the destruction around him, but with him who overrules all.

And then God announced to Noah, "And I, behold, I do bring the flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; every thing that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy family." And Noah did as God commanded him. And then for one hundred and twenty years (Gen. 6: 3) the inhabitants of earth were divided into the little family with whom God's covenant had been made, and the doomed inhabitants, who had developed more and more in sin, and who were ripening daily for destruction! Is it not so now? How does God look on this earth? The distinctions of caste, of office, of talent, etc.—how infinitesimally small are they, compared to the distinction which God sees between those who are born from above to inherit eternal life, and those who are "vessels of wrath fitted for, fitting themselves to destruction" (Rom. 9: 22). And yet Noah lived and preached righteousness (11. Pet. 2: 5); but the ungodly world went on as usual, regarding neither the preaching of Noah nor the proof, in his building of the ark, that he believed what he preached. And thus will it be when the Son of Man cometh to take away his own.

But God's word was fulfilled. The day dawned, in the six-hundredth year of Noah's life, when all the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. When the sea no longer kept its bounds, and the rain came pouring down in torrents for nearly six weeks, night and day, how could any escape? The very highest mountains were covered; there was no refuge but in the ark, the testimony of which had been universally rejected, and the door of which God had shut. They "knew not until the flood came, and took them all away" (Matt. 24: 39). By God's command Noah had brought into the ark, a pair of every kind of beast and bird and living creature, and seven of every clean beast. It must have been by direct guidance from the Lord that Noah could have gathered food suitable for this immense menagerie. It could have been God alone who made it possible that they should exist under such circumstances for a year and ten days, shut up in the ark. What a proof is this that life and death are not dependent on circumstances, but upon him in whose hand our breath is!

And now death overcame every living thing which was upon the earth, both man, and cattle, and creeping thing, and fowl of the heaven, and they were destroyed from the earth. And Noah only was left, and they that were with him in the ark. And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days, i. e., twenty-one weeks and a-half. Noah must have been fully occupied with his immense family of living creatures during all that long time, but God had not forgotten him. "God remembered Noah, and not him only, but also every living thing, and the cattle that were with him in the ark." God is not unmindful of any of his creatures. He first sent a wind over the earth, and then the mighty torrent of waters from above ceased, and the sea went back within its shores, and the waters of judgment, having accomplished their purpose, continually went down, until the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. But even then it was forty days before Noah opened the window of the ark and sent forth a raven, and then a dove from the ark, to see if the waters were abated. The raven remained, but the dove returned, and Noah must yet wait another seven days before he ventured out of the ark. And then it was only at God's bidding that he went (Gen. 8: 15, 16), and gave up to God his charge of the representatives of all created beings. His first action on a cleansed earth was praise. All the old associations of sin were destroyed: he stood with God as the new head of the race. What would follow? It was a grand opportunity which was given to this man who walked with God. His circumstances were exceptional. Would Noah be equal to the occasion, and would his sons with their wives follow the Lord fully, now that all temptations from without were removed? God was pleased with Noah's offering, but he said in his heart, "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake, for that the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." Alas! the evil was inherent: the new circumstances could not prevent it.

FOOD AND WEATHER.

Temperature Increased or Reduced by Food.

The old army ration for the tropics has been very sharply criticised for the reason that it consists of articles of food that any person even slightly acquainted with the elements of food knows is not adapted to the needs of the human system in hot weather. Nature shows forth in the selection of food by inhabitants of various countries; for instance, the Esquimaux in a cold climate selects heavy, carbonaceous foods, tallow, bacon and such; while the Hindoo and inhabitants of hot countries turn to the cereals for sustenance.

We should follow this hint of nature, and particularly in hot weather should avoid much butter, meat or any of that class of food. Perhaps a little meat once a day is not amiss, even in hot weather, but the breakfast and luncheon should be made of fruit, one or two slices of entire wheat bread and some Grape-Nuts and cream. Grape-Nuts are mentioned, because they furnish the ideal cereal food in a most palatable and delicious form, in addition to which, they are ready cooked and require no attention whatever from the cook.

A person can pass through weather that may be intensely hot, in a comfortable manner, if the food be properly selected, and the above suggestions can be put into practice with most excellent results.

Artistic Monuments COST NO MORE THAN PLAIN ONES

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive. White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Aug. 14

1. A rich, childless wife would love to adopt a little one, but distrusts her own capacity to train it. She could give it love, and even indulgence, but dreads what might prove an unwise experiment. Or she might train it by proxy, but she would then miss the love that comes from personal contact. What should she do?

2. Who made, and who wore the first artificial limb on record, and what were the circumstances connected with it?

3. What is the origin, as far as known, of the custom of tarring and feathering an offender?

4. When a young man is converted while living in a boarding-house full of worldly people, should he seek a new home among godly people, or should he stay, in the hope of influencing his former associates by his words and example?

5. Is children's day, as usually observed, a benefit to the Church?

Questions of the Week

1. What is the longest word in the English language, and what is its derivation and its meaning?

The word antitransubstantiationist, with twenty-seven letters, is probably the longest authorized word in the English language. The components of the word give the ideas of opposition, change and substance, and thus the word means one who is opposed to the doctrine of a change in substance. The meaning of the theological term antitransubstantiationist, is made apparent in the canon of the Council of Trent.

F. L. SAWYER.

[Among other words sent in answer were the following: Intercommunicativeness, incomprehensibility, transubstantiationist, disintellectualization, unexceptionableness, etc.]

2. Where did the "Week of Prayer" originate?

During the forties the missionary work was greatly hindered in India. Two bloody Sikh wars had occurred, which resulted in the loss of much property. Three missionaries, with their wives and children, suffered martyrdom. It was the next year, after these terrible experiences that the Lodian mission, as a last resort, sent a pathetic call to Christendom to engage in prayer for the conversion of the world. It was suggested that the first week in January be observed for that purpose.

KATE H. BOOTH.

The "Week of prayer" originated with the Evangelical Alliance shortly after its foundation in England in 1846. This Association sends out the call for the week of prayer yearly.

G. H. ROGERS.

3. Why does not dew form visibly on stones as well as on grass and on the nearby ground?

Dew is the vapor of the air condensed by coming in contact with bodies colder than itself. During the day the surface of the earth is hotter than the air, but after sunset it radiates, or parts with its heat much more rapidly than does the air. As a consequence, the earth is often five to ten degrees colder than the air at night, when the sky is cloudless. The heat thus radiated at night was first absorbed during the day from the sun. The pith of the question lies in the fact that a great difference exists in the radiation of heat from different substances and surfaces. Grass, the leaves of plants, and the loose, uneven surface of well-tilled earth, part with heat much more rapidly than beaten paths, stones and metals. Hence the vapor of the air is much more freely condensed by contact with the former than the latter objects.

ARTHUR H. BIGG.

Water is diffused through the air as an invisible vapor. The capacity which the air has of holding vapor increases with its temperature, hence the greater rapidity of evaporation in warm weather than in cold air. Evaporation will not go on beyond the capacity of the surrounding air, and hence when the air is as highly saturated with vapor as its temperature admits of, it is said to be fully charged. If the air is by any cause cooled down below the temperature at which the moisture which will be its full charge, a part of its vapor will necessarily separate from it in the form of water. Thus we see that cold bodies placed in the open air studded with drops of water—dewdrops—because they cool down the surrounding air below its point of full charge. Dew after sunset is caused by the temperature of moist solid bodies falling below that of the air, the extent to which the is the mainspring of our love for Christ, a sympathetic understanding of his sorrows and great sufferings for our sake—the cause of all true conversion.

MRS. IDA EFFINGER.

Certainly not. Sympathy is the very soul of love. Eliminate that "fellow-feeling," that feeling with another in his woes, and you take the heart out of love, and make it a cold, lifeless thing, an empty show at best. Genuine love often begins in pity, which is good evidence of a sympathetic soul. Helplessness appeals, not so much to reason as to sympathy. This is why one woman, having buried children of her own, is moved to build an orphanage for a thousand motherless children. This is why one man, having a prodigal son himself, is moved to establish a soul-saving mission for a thousand prodigals who are sixty, before the process begins again. The origin of the ten stems," says Dr. Meade, "may be ascribed to the ten digits, and twelve branches to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, which are to be met with in all the nations of antiquity." Did not Tennyson really mean to imply that the Europeans, as much in a short period as his slower Mongolian brother in a vastly longer one, must he not have imagined the cycle of the very great one? Possibly he was in error, because of the common opinion that the Chinese chronology extends through an almost infinite period, an opinion declared by Dr. Hurst, an authority on the subject, to be erroneous.

AMELIA H.

The expression originated with Lord Tennyson in the following couplet in Locksley Hall:

Thro' the shadow of the globe we sweep in the younger day:
Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of pagans.

That is to say, an ordinary lifetime of the midst of civilization, with its light and blessings, its opportunities for being and achieving, is better than endless ages of barbarism, with their mental darkness and wild frolics, "like a beast of lower pleasures." Better even a short life teeming with opportunities and thronged with responsibilities and its attendant "shadows of the globe," such as Tennyson's hero experienced, than to flee all these things to seek and, to find if it were possible, less years of quiet and aimless ease.

B. F. WHITTE.

Miscellaneous Questions

Annetta DeK., Waterbury, Conn. What is the present condition of missionary work in the Philippines, as to the portions of the island signed to the various missionary denominations? Are all working harmoniously on some definite plan, or are they working on individual lines regardless of territorial boundaries?

At a conference of missionaries held in Manila, April 24, it was agreed that the Methodist should take as their field certain designated provinces in Luzon, while other districts in the same island were allotted to the Presbyterians, and United Brethren. The islands of Panay and Negros were divided between the Presbyterians and Baptists.

Jere. M., Providence, R. I. 1. Where is the present centre of population? 2. At what rate, and in what direction is it moving?

1. Six miles south of Columbus, Ind. 2. It has been steadily moving westward, but very slowly—a little over a mile and a third annually—and the outlook is that the next years will show an even slower movement.

A. S., St. Johnsville, N. J. Are any of the people repentant and inquiring the way of salvation?

If we may judge from recent missionary reports, the people are everywhere showing signs of repentance for the mission tacks, and are now endeavoring, by winning them back and showing them much kindness, to prove their sincerity. As the deeper spiritual change, it will assuredly come in due time, and thousands of the people will be drawn into the Christian fold.

H. F. M., Montclair, Col., writes, giving upon God's people everywhere the importance of sending religious literature to the sane asylums. Thousands of the mild-mannered, unfortunates would find the greatest comfort in such suitable books and papers as thoughtful friends could easily supply.

coolness is carried depending on the power which the substances have of radiating or parting with the heat which they have absorbed during the day. Plants and grass radiate much more quickly than stones, and consequently dew is deposited upon them in drops. This shows the wisdom of the Creator, because the moisture held in the atmosphere is necessary to the growth and support of plants, while stones do not need it, and consequently have not been provided with the power of attracting it.

MRS. CLARA R. ABBOTT.

4. Can there be genuine love without sympathy?

Love is almost universally conceded to be the most powerful of the human emotions. I believe sympathy, that subtle, tender bond of feeling, to be the basis of true love. That sympathy can exist without love is undoubtedly, but love without sympathy, never. There may be a species of love, a sort of mutual attraction, which has set many a young couple afloat on the sea of matrimony, but if each finds the other unable to sympathize with their tastes, even in such trivial matters as dress, books and food, there will be discords, then when such serious question arise as the upbringing of children, with its important issues, and the religion of the home, and the many questions which arise in the carrying out of a true Christian belief, the form of love which existed without sympathy, will find itself utterly inadequate to the demands made upon it, and the result will be a total wreck of happiness in the home. Surely sympathy

"nothing to him." It was just such love, full of sympathy, which moved the Son of God to lay aside the glory he had with the Father, and tabernacle in the flesh, and finally die on the cross for a world of guilty sinners, that by their believing in him they might be saved. Take this Christ-like sympathy out of love, and Christian effort will die out of the thoughts of men. It would be taking the "savor" out of the "salt," or the "light" out of the "life." Evidently there can be no such thing as genuine love without that powerful, inner moving in the human heart toward others, which we call sympathy.

CHARLES LYNCH.

5. What are the origin and meaning of the expression, "A cycle of Cathay?"

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay," sang Tennyson in Locksley Hall, and from this, one might infer that the "cycle" referred to was vast in its duration. Possibly the poet thought so, but in Chinese chronology a cycle is sixty years, and Cathay is an old name for China. The word was introduced into Europe by Marco Polo, and is a corruption, it is said, of the Tartar word Khetai, the name of the northern empire at the time of the Mongolian invasion. The cycle is said to have been invented by Hwang Te, more than four thousand years ago. This current year 1901, is the 38th year of the 76th cycle. The number sixty was chosen because the "ten celestial stems" when united with the "twelve terrestrial branches" in a peculiar combination (which there is not space here to explain) have to be repeated six times, thus forming

THE GRANARY OF THE WORLD.

TEAMS OF HARVESTERS AT WORK ON A GREAT FARM IN THE WEST

OUR country has been signally blessed this year in the promise of the greatest cereal crop ever known in its history. In Texas, Kansas and Nebraska, States which have been the scenes of devastation and trouble of which the generous readers of this paper have an intimate knowledge—prospects have been reported as particularly fine. Kansas sent a few weeks ago, an appeal for 50,000 men to help harvest her wheat crop, and began pressing into service all the idle men who could be found within her own borders, attracting, too, thousands of the unemployed from other States. In the four staples, corn, wheat, wool and cotton, never before was there ground for such phenomenal expectations as at present.

Our country is the only one in all the world to-day among civilized nations, which can absolutely rely upon its own resources. It is not only able to supply the essentials in the way of food, raiment, metals, fuel, etc., but is fast learning to grow its own tea and coffee, and produce its own silks. The grapes that blush upon our hill-sides, vie with those of famous vineyards in Spain and France; and in what country in the world look is, according to some good judges, over 11,000,000 bales. Magnificent as these figures are, those for hay must surpass them, as it is said that for 1901 is to be our greatest and most valuable crop.

It is predicted that our yield of corn for the present year will be well over 2,000,000,000 bushels. Nebraska alone contributing 300,000,000 bushels. Well for the outside world as for ourselves that this is so, and that the harvestings of our 28,000,000 wheat acreage promise so fair. Well, too, that we have cotton and to spare, for people of almost all tribes and lands wear our goods. India is our liberal customer, China is another. The latter country will require more and more of our products. The richest laden steamer ever clearing Portland, Ore., recently sailed from that port, bearing, as the largest part of her cargo, over 30,000 barrels of flour and 250,000 feet of lumber for Hongkong, besides consignments for Shanghai and Singapore.

Imagine yourself in a harvest-field. Twelve teams of harvesters, each with four horses and a working crew of five men for the machines, are arranged abreast. They start, and pass swiftly along, reaping and binding as they go. While you gaze at them they pass out of however, through skilful financing, has been reduced by $58,000,000 since the spring of '99, which involves an annual saving of about $11,000,000 interest. Our surplus treasury reserve is $75,864,998.

What do these things mean to us? We are not calling attention to the fulness of our land in any spirit of vainglory. Far otherwise. In no such temper did Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, say recently, that we are in a position to be not only independent of the rest of the world, but to starve almost any nation out if we so chose. Commercial combinations formed against us would be powerless to effect our ruin; and nations cannot like to go to war with their food givers and clothiers. We are in a position to do right without fear or favor. Minister Wu, sharing in our Independence Day celebration at Philadelphia, spoke of American patriotism as something better than that which goes by the name, but which is only another form of national selfishness. He said: "This nation has not sprung into existence without a manifest destiny. There must be some noble ends for the world at large for which the independence of the United States was established," and suggested that our mission was to show that besides our own will we find such varied wealth of luscious fruit? Nature has poured out before us gifts of gold and purple and crimson, until the treasures of every clime are ours. Our vegetables are as rich and varied, and the market-gardener's occupation is one of increasing pleasure and profit. Multitudes of flowers contribute to our well-being in ways substantial as poetic, and through continually enlarging apiary enterprises, the sweets are extensively resolved into honey. The descriptive term, "a land flowing with milk and honey," well applies to America. Our flocks and herds increase as we have cattle upon a thousand hills.

WORKERS IN AN ALABAMA COTTON FIELD

Last year our wool clip was about 3,000,000 pounds, nearly one-third as much as all Europe's. We marketed 28,000 hogs, almost every country in the world drawing upon us for bacon. We sent abroad over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, and over 200,000,000 bushels of corn. The world's cotton was estimated at 12,455,000 bales, of which we produced 10,990,000. Our present cotton out-sight on the level field. The horizon limit of a man's vision as he stands on the plain is fifteen miles, therefore, the teams have covered fifteen miles before they disappear to gather up the golden grain for who knows how many miles further? The largest farm in Dakota has actually supplied such a scene as this. No other country in the world can furnish such a harvest field and such a crew of teams as this. Recently, in one day in Kansas, 10,000 harvest machines were running, and 50,000 men were laboring in wheat fields. In addition to being the world's granary, we might fairly claim to be a sort of international employment bureau, since we furnish occupation to so many people who come from abroad to make a living here.

Our credit is better than that of any other nation. It is so good, in fact, that we are unable to pay our debts off, as fast as would like—paradoxical as that may seem. Investors here and abroad will not accept payment on our bonds before they are due. Our bonded debt patriotism in its true sense is synonymous with humanity, justice, truth, law and order. As to starving the world—we have opened our hearts and hands to feed its dying millions. Thank God that we have had power to save the perishing; that we had the will to save them; and that, if occasion calls, we will do the same thing over and over again. Is there no connection between the way we have used our power and that power's continuance—no connection between blessings given by us to others and blessings received by us of God? Verily, "He that giveth to the poor shall not lack," and "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed," are faithful promises. "For the Lord thy God blesseth thee and thou shalt lend unto many nations," may be as truly said of America as of ancient Israel. And in this lending, the smallest farmer and the humblest toiler who has given his mite to the needy, has had honorable share with the richest and greatest in bringing blessings upon our land.

Extravagance

TEXT: Jeremiah 17: 11:

AS THE PARTRIDGE SITETH ON EGGS, AND HATCHETH THEM NOT; SO HE THAT GETTETH RICHES, AND NOT BY RIGHT, SHALL LEAVE THEM IN THE MIDST OF HIS DAYS, AND AT HIS END SHALL BE A FOOL

ILLUSION is here made to a well-known fact in natural history. If a partridge or a quail or a robin brood the eggs of another species, the young will not stay with the one that happened to brood them, but at the first opportunity will assort with their own species. Those of us who have been brought up in the country have seen the dismay of the farmyard hen, having brooded aquatic fowls, when after a while they tumble into their natural element, the water. So my text suggests that a man may gather under his wings the property of others, but it will, after awhile escape; it will leave the man in a sorry predicament, and make him feel very silly.

What has caused all the black days of financial disasters for the last sixty years? Some say it is the credit system. Something back of that. Some say it is the spirit of gambling ever and anon becoming epidemic. Something back of that. Some say it is the sudden shrinkage in the value of securities, which even the most honest and intelligent men could not have foreseen. Something back of that. I will give you the primal cause of all these disturbances. It is the extravagance of modern society, which impels a man to spend more money than he can honestly make, and he goes into wild speculation in order to get the means for inordinate display; and sometimes the man is to blame, and sometimes his wife, and oftener both. Five thousand dollars income, ten thousand dollars, twenty thousand dollars income are not enough for a man to keep up the style of living he proposes, and, therefore, he steers his bark toward the maelstrom. Other men have suddenly snatched up fifty or a hundred thousand dollars—why not he? The present income of the man not being large enough, he must move earth and hell to catch up with his neighbors. Others have a country seat—so must he. Others have an extravagant caterer—so must he. Others have a palatial residence—so must he.

Extravagance is the cause of all the defalcations of the last sixty years, and if you will go through the history of all the great panics and the great financial disturbances, no sooner have you found the story, than right back of it you will find the story of how many horses the man had, how many carriages the man had, how many residences in the country the man had, how many banquets the man gave—always, and not one exception for the last sixty years, either directly or indirectly extravagance the cause.

The Creator's Jewels

Now, for the elegances and the refinements and the decorations of life, I cast my vote. While I am considering this subject, a basket of flowers is handed in—flowers paradisiacal in their beauty. White calla with a green background of begonia. A cluster of heliotropes nestling in some geraniums. Sepal and perianth bearing on them the marks of God's finger. When I see that basket of flowers, they persuade me that God loves beauty and adornment and decoration. God might have made the earth so as to supply the gross demands of sense, but left it without adornment or attraction. Instead of the variegated colors of the seasons, the earth might have worn an unchanging dull brown.

Look out of your window any morning after there has been a dew, and see whether God loves jewels. Put a crystal of snow under a microscope, and see what God thinks of architecture. God commanded the priest of olden time to have his robe adorned with a wreath of gold, and the hem of his garment to be embroidered in pomegranates. The earth sleeps, and God blankets it with the brilliants of the night sky. The world wakes, and God washes it from the burnished laver of the sunrise. So I have not much patience with a man who talks as though decoration and adornment and the elegances of life are a sin, when they are divinely recommended. But there is a line to be drawn between adornment and decorations that we can afford and those we cannot afford, and when a man crosses that line he becomes culpable. I cannot tell you what is extravagant for you. You cannot tell me what is extravagant for me. What is right for a queen may be squandering for a duchess. What may be economical for you, a man with larger income, will be wicked waste for me, with smaller income. There is no iron rule on this subject. Every man before God and on his knees must judge what is extravagance, and when a man goes into expenditures beyond his means he is extravagant.

There are families in all our cities who can hardly pay their rent, and who owe all the merchants in the neighborhood, and yet have an apparel unfit for their circumstances, and are all the time sailing so near shore that business misfortune or an attack of sickness prepares them for pauperism. You know very well there are thousands of families in our great cities who stay in neighborhoods until they have exhausted all their capacity to get trusted. They stay in the neighborhoods until the druggists will let them have no more medicines, and the butchers will sell them no more meat, and the bakers will sell them no more bread, and the grocery-men will sell them no more sugar. Then they find the region unhealthy, and they hire a carman, whom they never pay, to take them to some new quarters, where the merchants, the druggists, the butchers, the bakers, and the grocery-men, come and give them the best rounds of beef and the best sugars and the best merchandise of all sorts, until they find out that the only compensation they are going to get is the acquaintance of the patrons. There are thousands of such thieves in all our big cities. I call them by the right name, for if a man buys anything he does not mean to pay for he is a thief.

Honest Failures

Of course, sometimes men are flung of misfortunes and they cannot pay. I know men who are just as honest in having failed as other men are honest in succeeding. I suppose there is hardly a man who has gone through life but there have been some times when he has been so hurt of misfortune he could not meet his obligations. But all that I put aside. There are a multitude of people who buy that which they never intend to pay for, for which there is no reasonable expectation they will ever be able to pay. Now, if you have become oblivious of honesty and mean to defraud, why not save the merchant as much as you can? Why not go some day to his store, and when nobody is looking, just shoulder the ham or the spare-rib, and in modest silence steal away? That would be less criminal, because in the other way you take not only the man's goods, but you take the time of the merchant and the time of his accountant, and you take the time of the messenger who brought you the goods. Now, if you must steal, steal in a way to do as little damage to the trader as possible.

John Randolph arose in the American Senate when a question of national finance was being discussed, and, stretching himself to his full height, in a shrill voice he cried out: "Mr. Chairman, I have discovered the Philosopher's Stone, which turns everything into gold—Pay as you go!" Society has got to be reconstructed on this subject, or the seasons of defalcation will continue to repeat themselves. You have no right to ride in a carriage for which you are hopelessly in debt to the wheelwright who furnished the landau, and to the horse-dealer who provided the blooded span, and to the harness-maker who caparisoned the gay steeds, and to the liveryman who has provided the stabling, and to the driver who, with rosetted hat, sits on the coach-box.

Oh, I am so glad it is not the absolute necessities of life which send people out into dishonesties and fling them into misfortunes. It is almost always the superfluities. God has promised us a house, but not a palace; raiment, but not chinchilla; food, but not canvas-back duck. I am yet to see one of these great defalcations which is not connected in some way with extravagance.

National Penalties

Extravagance accounts for the disturbance of national finances. Aggregations are made up of units, and when one half of the people of this country owe the other half, how can we expect financial prosperity? Again and again at the national election we have had a spasm of virtue, and we said "out with one administration and in with another, and let us have a new deal of things, and then we will get over all our perturbation." I do not care who is President, or who is Secretary of the Treasury, or how much breadstuffs go out of the country, or how much gold is imported, until we learn to pay our debts, and it becomes a general theory in this country that men must buy no more than they can pay for—until that time comes there will be no permanent prosperity. Look at the pernicious extravagance: take the one fact that New York every year pays three million dollars for theatrical amusements. While once in a while a Henry Irving, or an Edwin Booth, or a Joseph Jefferson thrills a great audience with tragedy, you know as well as I do that the vast majority of the theatres are as debased as debased they can be, as unclean as unclean they can be, and as damnable as damnable they can be. Three million dollars—the vast majority of those dollars going in the wrong direction.

Over a hundred millions paid in this country for cigars and tobacco a year. About two thousand million dollars paid for strong drink in one year in this country. With such extravagance, pernicious extravagance, can there be any permanent prosperity? Business men, cool-headed business men, is such a thing a possibility? These extravagances also account, as I have already hinted, for the positive crimes, the forgeries, the abscondings of the officers of the store on the business street swamped by the dependence on the fashionable avenue. The father's husband's craft capsized by carrying too much of a sail. That is what springs the leak in the mercantile money till. That is what cracks the pistols of the suicides. That is what tears down the banks. That is what stops insurance companies. That is what ruins this nation again and again in its triumphal march of prosperity. In the presence of the American people as far as I can get their attention, I want to arraign this monster curse of extravagance, and I want you to meet it with your scorn and hurl at it your anathema.

How many fortunes every year wrecked on the wardrobe. Things have got to such a pass that when we cry over our sins in church, we wipe the tears away with a hundred-and-fifty-dollar pocket handkerchief. I show you a domestic tragedy in five acts:

Act the first.—A home, plain and beautiful. Enter newly married pair. Enter contentment. Enter much happiness as ever gets in one home.

Act the second.—Enter discontent. Enter desire for larger expenditure. Enter envy. Enter jealousy.

Act the third.—Enter the queenly dressmakers. Enter the French milliners. Enter all costly plate and great extravagances.

Act the fourth.—Tip-top of society. Princesses of upper-tendom floating in and out, prancing on a large and magnificent scale. Enter contempt for other people.

Act the fifth and last.—Enter the assignee. Enter the sheriff. Enter the creditors. Enter humility. Enter the wrath of God. Enter the contempt of society. Enter ruin and death. Now drop the curtain. The play is ended and the lights are out.

I called it a tragedy. That is a misnomer. It is a farce.

Extravagance accounts for much of the pauperism. Who are these people whom you have to help? Many of them are the children of parents who had lived in luxury, had more than they needed, spent all they had, spent more too, then died and left their families in poverty. I could name a score of men who have every luxury. They smoke the best cigars, and they drink the finest wines, and they have the grand surroundings, and when they die their families will be on the cold charity of the world. Now, the death of such a man is a grand larceny. He swindles the world; he goes into his coffin, and he deserves to have his bones sold to the medical museum for anatomical specimens, the proceeds to furnish bread for his children.

Sad Obsequies

I know it cuts close. I did not know but some of you in high dudgeon would get up and go out. You stand it well! Some of you make a great swash, and after a while you will die, and ministers will be sent for to come and stand by your coffin and libel your excellences; but they will not come. If you send for me, I will tell you what my text will be, "Thou providest not for his own, and especially for the of his own household, is worse than an infidel." Alas, we find Christian men, men of large means, who sometimes talk eloquently about the Christian Church, and about civilization, expending everything on their lives and nothing on the cause of God.

And the desecration goes on, even to the funeral day. You know very well that there are men who die solvent, but the expenses are so great before they get underground they are insolvent. There are families that go into penury in wicked response to the demands of this day. They put in casket and tombstone, which they ought to put in bread. They wanted read, you gave them a tombstone.

Oh, my friends, let us take our stand against the extravagances of society. Do not pay for things which are frivolous when you may lack the necessities. Do not put one month's wages or salary into a trinket, into one trinket. Keep your credit good by seldom going for any. Pay! Do not starve a whole year to afford one Belshazzar's carnival. Do not buy a coat of many colors, and then in six months be out at the elbows. Flourish not, as some people I have known, who took apartments at a fashionable hotel and had the drawing-rooms attached, and then vanished one night, not even leaving their compliments for the lord. I tell you, my friends, in the day of God's judgment, we will not only have to give an account of the way we made our money, but for the way we spent it. We have got to leave all the things that surround us now. They that consecrate their wealth, their time, their all to God shall be held in everlasting remembrance, while I have the authority of this Book announcing that the name of the wicked shall be

THE GREAT HOT WAVE

In coming years, when tales of calamitous periods in metropolitan history are recited, the "Hot Week" preceding July 4 will not be forgotten. Not that New York bore that terrible visitation alone; our whole country suffered, and in some cities—Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk and Kansas City, for instance—the temperature climbed higher than here. On July 2, when the official degree in Philadelphia was 102.1-2, it was 99 here. In the former city, from 25 to 35 deaths from heat were reported for that day; here 118 to 186. To the total heat mortality for eleven large cities, including those named, New York contributed nearly half. As the city is the most densely populated spot on the continent, naturally the lion's share of anguish fell to its lot; 740 deaths and 872 prostrations from heat was six days' record. Horses suffered fearfully; one day 200 dropped dead. Ambulance bells rang right and left. Again and again the writer, almost blinded with heat, paused to see the unconscious body of some son or daughter of toil slung into a waiting ambulance and started off to Bellevue, the Roosevelt Presbyterian Hospital, or other shelter for the sick. Ambulances gave out, and delivery wagons or other vehicles were pressed into use to carry the sick and dying from the streets. People living in roomy houses could not sleep at night. Few tenement dwellers staid indoors; they could not exist in the breathless, furnace-like heat of their crowded quarters. Hundreds crowded roofs and fire-escapes, and controlled off and were killed. Piers were full of sleeping people. Whole families camped in seats and on sidewalks; patrolmen in the early day walked carefully, not to disturb slumbering women and children. All rules were relaxed. In the day, mothers and little children sought every bit of shade they could find. Every pump had a group of thirsty little ones around it. In business streets, men usually careful in dress, walked with coats off and collars unbuttoned; ordinary conventionalities were disregarded.

Every one who had means to get out of the sweltering city went. Cars and boats were loaded down. One night 15,000 people—exhausted with heat and fatigue slept on the beach at Coney Island—watched over by policemen, who walked up and down keeping guard over their rest. Never was New York put before to such straits as in this hot week—the like of which the oldest inhabitant cannot remember. On the Weather Bureau records, which go back thirty years, June 29 and 30 of 1901 are the hottest known; July 1 and 2, the hottest July days of this date ever registered. When the official thermometer up in the Weather Bureau Building was at 99, thermometers on the street level, where people were living and walking, ran up to 114; what the temperature was in the tenements, which were like ovens and furnaces, nobody knows. Tenement people are yet weak and faint from the effects of that fearful week, and ill prepared to stand the hot days yet before them. Hundreds of lives of little children hang as upon a thread. God help these weak ones through other hot spells that come! Nothing but a breath of country air, good food and care can put into many the strength to hold on to life till autumn comes. Without it, hundreds will die. Never in our Fresh-Air work has the need been as to-day. Never has the cry of the children been so plaintive, so insistent! Never has our opportunity for serving the Master by succoring his helpless little ones been so great. Only $3 sends a child to Mont-Lawn for ten days. This small sum may save a life; $6 sends two waifs; $9 three; $12 four; $30 may save ten little ones; for $60, twenty may be saved; $99 will send thirty-three.

Training Young Men and Women for the Mission Field

BIBLE study, with a view to practical work in the home or foreign mission field, is every year becoming more general. Colleges and institutes for this purpose are steadily multiplying. The Pennsylvania Bible Institute, Philadelphia, Pa., is one of the class that is meeting a need in the training of Christian workers for personal, pastoral, evangelistic and missionary work, and thus helping to carry out Christ's commission. "Gye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." It was founded in 1895 by Charles E. Hurlburt, who had long been well known in Y. M. C. A. work in several States. In later years was identified with the Africa Inland Mission as its director. Mr. Hurlburt felt the need of an interdenominational Bible school, where young men and women of limited means could be quickly fitted for useful service in the spiritual harvest field, in any part of the globe. Many young men and women have gone out from the Institute into various fields of Christian activity. Twelve are now missionaries in foreign fields; some thirty or more are candidates; twelve are pastors of churches; some are evangelists; others home missionaries and pastors' assistants, many are workers in Young Men's or Young Women's Christian Associations, or other branches of consecrated labor. The studies are under the supervision of the well-known Bible student and teacher, Frederic W. Farr, pastor of Bethlehem Baptist Church, Philadelphia, and with him are associated other pastors and teachers, who give systematic instruction. Evangelists, returned missionaries, and physicians also give lectures. The Institute depends for support, over and above what is paid by the students, upon voluntary contributions.

The main building, offices and lecture room are at 2016

Diamond street, Philadelphia. The women students board and room in this building, under the supervision of a matron; the men's building is located about one block away. Students usually stay two years at the Institute, but pupils are received who can stay only one year, or even a shorter time. Practical work is cultivated. Friday afternoon is set aside for personal visitation, visiting the sick, house-to-house work, distributing tracts and talking with people.

Any readers of this journal who are interested in the work of the Institute can obtain full information by writing to the superintendent, Mr. O. R. Palmer, at No. 2016 Diamond street, Philadelphia.

GOD CALLS ABRAHAM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 28. GEN. 12: 1-9 -- GOLDEN TEXT: I WILL BLESS THEE, AND MAKE THY NAME GREAT; AND THOU SHALT BE A BLESSING. GEN. 12: 2.

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GET THEE OUT OF THY COUNTRY.—Abraham was born in an idolatrous land and home (Josh. 24: 2, Gen. 31: 19, 20). For his sake, and for the sake of his children, God called him to separate himself from these harmful associations. He is the first of the noble line of pilgrim fathers, who have loved liberty and righteousness better even than fatherland and kindred and family, and so have gone out, each of them to a new country to found a new race with better surroundings; some of them chiefly anxious for civil liberty; others, of whom Abraham is one, seeking to escape a corrupt worship. To his caravan, discharging its "ships of the desert" beside a new altar erected to the one true God in Canaan, the words Mrs. Hemans wrote of those who went from their ships to their knees on the "bleak New England shore," are equally appropriate:

What sought they thus afar? Bright jewels of the mine?
The wealth of seas? The spoils of war?
They sought a faith's pure shrine.

Those who thus give the world a new start, as did Noah, Abraham, Moses, Paul and Luther, are the world's greatest men, who tower above their fellows in courage, and, as Ranke says, shake hands across the centuries. They were great enough to rise above that motto of sham patriotism, "My country, right or wrong." Whenever family or church or party or country are so wrong that we cannot hope they will be righted, and help to do it, God says, "Come out from among them and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you" (II Cor. 6: 17, 18). That is the text on which Abraham still preaches to us by actions that sible to do wrong. To many such God says, pointing to some safer home where saloons and other evils are mostly suppressed. "Get thee out of thy country."

He departed out of Haran. This was Abraham's second start. God originally called him out of Ur, years before (Acts 7: 2), to lead him to Canaan, "though Abraham knew not whither he went" (Heb. 11: 8). Even Abraham was not too great to yield to the common temptation to half obedience, half separation. He halted less than half way to his goal in Haran, and there his old father died without seeing Canaan. "Terah died in Haran," has long been the symbol of those overtaken by death while only half obedient to God, almost persuaded, but altogether lost. Such are many of the men at the head of the pews in the main aisle, half-brothers, who think the church is worth supporting, but never join it, because not willing to yield full obedience to God. Half way to the altar of membership, they halt at the Haran of the pew centre. As one of them, whose wife was a member and whose daughter played the organ, used to say, "My wife prays, my daughter plays, and I pay." Alas for him or her who halts at paying or playing, and does not go forward at God's call to praying. Many a boy or girl goes so far as to "say prayers" in secret, but stops short of full obedience to Christ's command to confess him before men. "We can serve God without condemnation only when we serve him without reservation." Even among those who confess Christ, there are many who have halted at half obedience. They have given up some sins, but are deliberately cherishing tion was in Abraham's frequent interviews with God, individual soul separated from fellowship with its Maker.

Thou shalt be a blessing. Men of this strenuous age are eager to do and say, but do not enough take time to be. Governor Russell of Massachusetts said to the graduates of the graduating classes of this year, "There is one thing better than making a living that is making a life." There is one better than praying to have a blessing and that is to be a blessing. He who seeks not spiritual enjoyment for self but the good of others, is the very one who is most to be blessed. In every child the noble ambition should be kindled to make the world better for having lived in it. The shadow of Peter passing by healed the sick, and so the presence of every one who passes through this world falls on others as a blessing or a curse. Jews, Christians and Mohammedans alike revere the name of Abraham and feel inspiration and blessing of his separated life.

He gave up much in leaving home at God's call, but in every way it was paid back with interest. He sacrificed his business interests, but became richer rather than poorer. He left his kindred and country, but became "the father of a nation" in a new land, and the spiritual father of millions. It recalls the time when Germany was invaded by Napoleon, and Frederick William III., the German ruler, finding his treasury exhausted, appealed to the women to bring their jewels, saying, "I will give you jewels of iron for jewels of gold." They responded nobly and saved their country and so originated the Order of the Iron Cross, the most honorable speak louder than words. Our theme is, Separation: (1) Started, (2) Halted, (3) Completed.

The Abrahams of our mission fields to-day are those born in idolatrous lands and homes, who, having learned of the true God, at his call break their attachments to family or country—to both, if need be—and risk their living, in order to escape from a bad environment, which they have tried in vain to change, and which threatens, instead, to change them and their children. Those in this country who weakly yield to the demand of greed, that they shall do work on the Lord's day that is not work of mercy or necessity, rather than risk wages or salary in obedience to God, may well feel rebuked as they hear of case after case where some newly-converted heathen merchant has adopted Sunday closing when all his customers were heathen, or where some workman had dared to refuse Sunday work at the risk of losing employment on all the other days in a land where the heathen employers have no regard for the Lord's day.

The hardest test of faith is when God calls a man to stay in an unfavorable environment and yet separate himself from all its sins.

The Abrahams of our own land are those who have the courage to rise above the class or set in which they find themselves. You were born among people who thought it no harm to drink wine or beer, to dance and play cards. Your conscience has been quickened and these things seem to you perils of the soul. Have you the fearlessness of faith, in obedience to God's call, to condemn, by abandoning, these customs of your country and kindred, and, if necessary, to go away at the risk of your livelihood to start life anew in safer surroundings? To come out of an evil business partnership, in which you as clerk or principal are involved in some daily falsehood and deceit or other wrong, is a call of God to which many in faithlessness fail to answer. For young men and boys who have come to think a Christlike life is true manliness, it is hard indeed to keep separate from the popular sins of the fellows of a baser sort with whom they must mingle in school or in business (See Psa. 1). Whenever possible Christian young men should change a business or boarding-house that daily tempts them to wrong, for a safer one. It is surprising how blindly many a father, for the sake of a hundred dollars or more of gain, takes his family where it will be as hard as possible for them to do right and as easy as pos-others. They have consecrated half of their lives, the home and Church half, but not the social, political, commercial part. You have only half abandoned dangerous amusement, only half given up Sabbath-breaking. As the Scotch say: "God wants us to be o' and o'," that is, out and out.

And they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came. There was no more halting.

Separation Completed Abraham went right on until he reached the centre of Canaan, where God himself called a halt to tell him, there by the historic oak of Moreh, in that beautiful vale of Shechem, under the Mount Gerizim of future beatitudes, beside the altar he had at once set up in his new home—how many forget that!—that the Creator had given him that whole land of Canaan for his children's children. Whatever may be said of other land titles, Abraham's deed, from the Creator of the land, was unquestionable. Again he moved, and at Bethel, as it was afterwards called by Jacob, meaning God's house, he built another altar, as this pilgrim father was wont to do wherever he pitched his moving tent. Giants and wicked tribes yet occupied the land, which was his as yet only by promise, and it was no less "by faith" that Abraham saw himself the father of a great people, being yet childless at seventy-five. But his faith has been honored, not only in that Canaan became the land of his children, but also in that his natural and spiritual descendants, Jews and Christians (Gal. 3: 8; Acts 3: 26), have literally blessed the families of the world through Christ, "the seed of Abraham," and in all the rich meanings of that Christian word, "home."

I will make thy name great. John G. Woolley said recently to Chicago University students, "We cannot all undertake to be great, but we can all be true." And we may add that it is those who at any cost strive to be true, that after a hundred years are most likely to be accounted great—even among men—while it is they only that all the time are called "great in the kingdom of heaven."

Abraham not only started a new race but a new sense of human individuality. Men had been thought of by nations and families. "The sacred individuality of the human soul" was to be brought to light in Christ, but its first dim revelaof German orders, picturing the glory of self-sacrifice. So it is ever in nobly giving up that we get what is most precious, not in honor only, but in character.

Not knowing whither he went. Men say, by way of excusing themselves for failure to obey some call of God, "I couldn't quite see my way clear." But why should we see our way? when we can see or know our Divine Guide? He knew not whither he went, but he knew with whom he went. We know not how the way shall bend, but we know it will end.

Lo, I go on not knowing, I would not if I might,
I would rather walk in the dark with God than go alone in the light,
I would rather walk with him by faith
Than walk alone by sight.

Abraham had this testimony that his ways pleased God. A railway gate-keeper who, one cold night, required every passenger to show his ticket, before passing through the train, and was rewarded with considerable grumbling and protesting. Major Whittle said to him, "You are a very unpopular man to-night." "I only care to be popular with one man," was the reply, "and that is the superintendent." He might have pleased the passengers, disobeyed order and lost his position. He was too wise for that; his business was to please one man—the man who hired him, gave him his orders, and rewarded him for faithfulness, and who would discharge him for disobedience. So Abraham shows that to be popular with God is the one favor worth seeking.

Beersheba derives its name from "seven wells." The Interior calls attention to the fact that Prof. Geo. L. Robinson of McCormick Seminary, Chicago, printed engravings of photographs of six of the wells in the Biblical world. The seventh had been filled up but he found the curbing. In every year's explorations confirms the historic accuracy of the Bible, and the shovels of the exploration societies are burying all the theories of Bible legends and myths. The leaf, the standard authority on the laws of evidence, is in his book on The Testimony of the Four Evangelists, that the confirmations of the Bible's reliability as a witness, want us in believing that difficulties yet unexplained are due to our inadequate knowledge, and should not put suspicion on a witness so fully confirmed.

SHANSI SENDS MESSENGERS PLEADING FOR HELP

Our Missionary Relief Committee Now Hard at Work Among the Famine-stricken in Four Chinese Provinces

IN a cablegram to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Tientsin, the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Chairman of our China Missionary Famine Relief Committee, reports the progress of the Committee's work. The relief party, under Missionaries E. H. Edwards and M. B. Duncan, who lately set out on the long journey to the provinces of Shansi and Shensi, have, so far as heard from, encountered no mishap. It is a good two weeks' trip in ordinary times, and communication, like everything else in China, is slow; but in view of the very friendly attitude of the government officials and people, and the general disposition to facilitate their journey, no serious delays are apprehended anywhere. The travelers are amply escorted, but in the changed condition of affairs, such a precaution seems to have been more of a form than a necessity.

Meanwhile, the other members of the Committee find themselves suddenly overwhelmed with demands in connection with the relief work in Shantung and Chih-li. Owing to this extraordinary pressure, Chairman Smith says that it has been impossible to attend to any other matters.

Now that the second remittance of $20,000 has reached the Committee's hands, it is enabled to proceed with relief measures with confidence and vigor. News of the progress of the relief work in Shansi is anxiously awaited at Tientsin, where the first reports from the missionaries may shortly be expected. Secretary J. S. Hiner, of the China Inland Mission, Toronto, Can., has received from China the following, which he has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the information of contributors to the Relief Fund and all who are interested in the work:

"Two native Christians, T'ong-Hsi-cheo and Sang-Hsien-u, have reached Tientsin from Shansi, and the following is an extract from a letter received from them: 'At the present time, the sufferings of the Christians in Shansi are intense, on account of the famine. In the Ping-jiang district, the price of rice and grain is extremely dear; a teo of wheat being 3,600, or 3,700; Inan corn 2,600 and millet 3,200 cash. Moreover, eight-tenths of the new wheat (growing in the fields) is dried up, and there being no spring rains, the grain for autumn crops cannot be sown.'

"These two native Christians, Tong-Hsi-cheo and Sang-Hsien-u, made the long and difficult journey from Shansi to Tientsin to plead for help, the news of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief exposition having encouraged the sufferers in that province to make an effort to have operations. A 'cash' is about the value of 1-16 of a cent, and a teo of rice the equivalent of .87 of a peck. Thus a teo, or about two-thirds of a peck, cost $2.10, which is at the rate of $13.50 per bushel—a famine price truly.

"From all the accounts that have lately come through, it is evident that there has been, thus far, no abatement of the famine, and this later news through the China Inland Mission workers (who were the first to return to the field), shows how acute and widespread is the distress. There are 10,000 native converts in Shansi alone, but they represent only an infinitesimal fraction of the province where eleven millions are suffering the pangs of starvation. Doubtless one of the earliest duties of our Famine Fund workers will be to relieve the native Christians, yet there is to be no distinction on account of faith; the unbeliever will receive food and medicines as promptly as will the Chinese convert. Indeed, the very object of the relief work is to convince the people of the friendship and genuine sympathy of the Christian nation whose almoners the missionaries are.

In Honan province much suffering is reported, showing that the famine is spreading. At Changte-fu there have been many deaths from actual starvation. This province, bordering on Shansi, which lies to the north, is not within the present scope of the Famine Relief Committee's operations. It is ordinarily a most prosperous district, having railroad and river connections for the transportation of supplies. In its present condition it is powerless to help its northern neighbor.

HIS EXCELLENCY, WU TING FANG
Minister of the Chinese Empire at Washington

What sad tragedies are being enacted behind those hills that form the eastern border of Shansi has not yet been told. Enough is known, however, to make us shrink from contemplating the whole ghastly truth, when the world learns it from the reports of the relieving missionaries. Meanwhile, the plain duty of Christian people is to hold up the hands of the famine relief workers by supplying them, through the Fund, with abundant means for their life-saving operations. All responsibility for the carrying out of the work rests with the Committee, whose plans are not to be hampered by interference or outside direction. But the success of its gigantic task, undertaken in the name of Christ and humanity, rests upon God's people here who have sent the missionaries out, up the rivers, across the dry, waterless plains, and through the mountain gorges to the rescue of the perishing people of Shansi. Let us see to it that we perform faithfully our part of the work, and, with our gifts and our prayers, the devoted little band of missionaries now in Shansi may, under Divine blessing, be made the instruments of saving a great multitude of lives and bringing the oldest province in China into Christ's spiritual kingdom.

His Excellency, Minister Wu Ting Fang, China's representative at Washington, has been a warm friend of the relief movement ever since it started. He writes to the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

CHINESE LEGATION, WASHINGTON.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, New York City:

I am deeply gratified to learn from your letter of the 27th inst. that you have remitted another $20,000 to China for famine relief purposes. I have advised Earl Li Hung Chang by cable of the remittance referred to. I will certainly do what I can to assist you in the good work which you have so nobly undertaken and are conducting so successfully.

Yours very truly, WU TING FANG.

The photographs on this page are specially timely and interesting, in view of present conditions in China. In some of the larger cities, there is a custom which is probably found in no other country in the world. A tract of waste land in the suburbs is set apart by the authorities as a "dying field," and there the destitute poor, the discouraged, the homeless, the hopelessly diseased have the privilege of lying down and awaiting death undisturbed. In these terrible famine times, the "dying fields" present scenes that would make the stoutest heart shudder. Poor creatures, mere skeletons, lie around, patiently and uncomplainingly awaiting death. Another photograph shows a crowd of refugees assembled at a boat-landing on the Pei-ho River, awaiting transportation to some distant point of safety and abundance. The native Bible-woman is a type of a class of faithful teachers, many of whom have given up their lives for the Christian faith and all of whom have suffered during the long persecution and in the subsequent famine.

Contributions to the Famine Relief Fund continue to be received in a gradually increasing volume. It is earnestly hoped that all who are interested in the work of saving the perishing peasants of China will act promptly, and thus enable the Committee to push the relief operations with vigor. Many very touching letters have been received from contributors. One (from J. M. S., York, Pa.) sends the birthday pennies of a number of little girls. Many send sums representing "the Lord's money," which they have set aside for just such emergencies as this. A poor, hard-working woman (Mrs. A. Z. T., Randolph, Mass.) sends $27, "being led by the Lord to make this offering." Nearly all invoke the Divine blessing on the work, and that it may be the means of saving a great multitude, body and soul. "We are poor," says the writer of one letter (O. W. M., Maine, Minn.), "but He may bless it so that it may do much good. God knows our hearts, and we send the gift in His name."

"I send this ($2) to help the starving Chinese," writes G. C., Sulphur Springs, N. Y. "I think it good to turn the piece of jewelry into money for the missionary cause." "May your noble charity be rewarded by the awakening in many hearts of an hunger for the eternal Bread of Life," writes Rev. A. Bockstruck, Warrenton, Mo. ($2). "I am an old man (72) and my wife is 67. We are all alone now. We have a little money laid up for a wet day to come, but will cast this loaf of bread upon the waters ($5), and as it floats out, my earnest prayer is that it may be hastened and save some of the perishing ones," writes C. B. H., Pleasant Lake, N. Dak.

All contributions to the China Famine Fund should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Every contribution, however small, will be acknowledged in these columns.

Rivalry Among Churches

ONE of the greatest hindrances to the world's evangelization is unhappy competition between neighboring congregations. It is the same in all the cities, but is more conspicuous in the villages and towns. The first church of the village has a large congregation and a good minister. Neither pastor nor people have ever been excited about anything save once, when a resident of the city moved into the village and tried to distract the church by suggesting a young people's prayer-meeting; but the officials formed themselves into a line, as at a fire, and passed buckets of cold water till the danger was put out. About the last item of fresh news they seemed to have heard was that Moses slew an Egyptian; but they said not much about that, for the reason that they did not want to commit themselves, or spoke of it in such a guarded way, that if they wanted to change sides on the question they could do so without sacrificing their manliness. The last church that Rip Van Winkle attended before getting drowsy was that. On the day he left they were asleep, and when he woke up they were asleep yet. The dominie has not prepared a new sermon for ten years. The paper is very yellow—a color he prefers, since it looks like the parchment in which the Scriptures were originally written. The same Thanksgiving discourse does for every year with this slight change: He has two slips of paper, one marked A, the other B. If it has been a prosperous year, then on Thanksgiving Day he uses the slip marked A; but if the corn and potatoes have been poor, he uses the slip B. Everything in that church is comfortable, fat and easy. But a few good men, wanting a little more life, build a second church and call a devoted minister. Their means are small, and the times hard. The old minister does not like the new one, and takes every opportunity of keeping him humble. Old minister goes around one afternoon to hear new minister, who is, of course, embarrassed, and does not do as well as usual, and nearly breaks down in the sermon. Old minister looks mortified, puts his head down on the pew in front to hide his embarrassment, and goes home wondering how any people can stand such preaching.

The second church finally goes down. It had been under a broadside fire since the day it was dedicated. There was room for two, yea, for four religious societies, but First Church did not think so. Oftimes was the experiment tried again, but no sooner did a Methodist, or a Baptist, or Episcopal head lift above the water, than there came from the old-established meeting-house of the place a volley of anathemas. The old church killed the young church, or crippled it for many years. How much better for all churches to help each other? Room for all. There should be no collision among the Gospel craft, for they are both in the King's service.

That they all may be one . . . that the world may believe. John 17: 21.

The Important Sexton

KING DAVID, it is evident, once thought something of becoming a church sexton, for he said, "I had rather be a doorkeeper," and so on. But he never carried out the plan, perhaps because he had not the qualification. It requires more talent, in some respects, to be sexton than to be king. A sexton, like a poet, is born. A church, in order to peace and success, needs the right kind of a man at the prow, and the right kind at the stern—that is, a good minister, and a good sexton. But few people appreciate how much a good sexton has to do with a church's prosperity. He is the minister's blessing, the church's joy, a harbinger of the millennium. People come to church to have him help them up the aisle. He wears slippers. He stands or sits at the end of the church during an impressive discourse, and feels that, though he did not furnish the ideas, he at least furnished the wind necessary in preaching it. He has a quick nostril to detect unseparated odors, and puts the man who eats garlic on the back seat in the corner. He does not regulate the heat by a broken thermometer, minus the mercury. He has the window-blinds arranged just right—the light not too glaring, so as to show the freckles, nor too dark, so as to cast a gloom, but a subdued light that makes the plainest face attractive. He rings the bell merrily for Christmas festival, and tolls it sadly for the departed. He has real pity for the bereaved in whose house he goes for the purpose of burying their dead, not giving, by cold, professional manner, the impression that his sympathy for the troubled is overpowered by the joy that he has in selling another coffin. He forgets not his own soul, and though his place is to stand at the door of the ark he is surely inside of it. After awhile, a Sabbath comes when everything is wrong in the church: the air is impure, the furnaces fail in their work, and the eyes of the people are blinded with an unpleasant glare. Everybody asks, "Where is our old sexton?" Alas! he will never come again. He has gone to join Obed-edom and Berechiah, the doorkeepers of the ancient ark. He will never again take the dusting-whisk from the closet under the church stairs, for it is now with him "Dust to dust." The bell which he so often rang takes up its saddest tolling for him who used to pull it, and the minister goes into his disordered and unswept pulpit, and finds the Bible upside down as he takes it up to read his text in Psalm 84th, 10th verse: "I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness!"

Those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary. 1. Cor. 12: 22.

Useful Lawyers

BOOKS setting forth forms for deeds, mortgages, notes and contracts, are no doubt valuable. It should be a part of every young man's education to know something of these. We cannot for the small business transactions of life be hunting up the "attorney-at-law," or the village squire. But economy in the transfer of property or in the making of wills is sometimes a permanent disaster. There are so many quirks in the law, so many hiding places for scamps, so many modes of twisting phraseology, so many decisions, precedents and rulings, so many John Does who have brought suit against Richard Roes, that you had better in all important business matters seek out an honest lawyer.

The field, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure unto him for a possession. Gen. 23: 17.

Our Metropolis

THERE has been so much said and printed of late implying that New York is a semi-pandemonium, that it is time we recall some of the good things about this city at the mouth of the Hudson.

Grand old New York! What southern thoroughfare was ever smitten by pestilence, when our physicians did not throw themselves upon the sacrifice! What distant land has cried out in the agony of famine, and our ships have not put out with breadstuffs! What street of Damascus, or Beyrout, or Madras that has not heard the step of our missionaries? What struggle for national life, in which our citizens have not poured their blood into the trenches! What gallery of exquisite art, in which our painters have not hung their pictures! What department of literature or science to which our scholars have not contributed! I need not speak of our public schools, where the children of the cordwainer, and milkman, and glassblower, stand by the side of the flattered sons of millionaires and merchant princes; or of the insane asylums on all these islands, where they who came out cutting themselves among the tombs, now sit, clothed, and in their right mind. I need not speak of the institutions for the blind, the lame, the deaf and the dumb, for the incurables, for the widow, the orphan, and the outcast; or of the thousand-armed machinery that sends streaming down from the reservoir the clear, bright, sparkling, God-given water that rushes through our aqueducts, and dashes out of the hydrants, and tosses up in our fountains, and hisses in our steam engines, and showers out the conflagration, and sprinkles from the baptismal font of our churches; and with silver note, and golden sparkle, and crystalline chime, says to hundreds of thousands of our population, in the authentic words of him who made it, "I will; be thou clean!"

Seek the peace of the city, and pray unto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace. Jer. 29: 7.

Summer in the Country

IT is never real morning except in the country. In the early part of the day, there is a mixed color that climbs down over the roofs opposite, and through the smoke of the chimney, that make people think it is time to get up and comb their hair. But we have real morning in the country. Morning! descending "from God out of heaven, like a bride adorned for her husband." A few moments ago I looked out, and the army of night shadows were strong in their tents. A red light on the horizon, that does not make me think, as it did Alexander Smith, of "the barren bea of hell," but more like unto the fire kindled on the shore by him whom the disciples saw at daybreak stirring the bla on the beach of Gennesaret. Just now the dew woke in the hammock of the tree-branches, and the light kiss it. Yonder, leaning against the sky, two great uprights of me, crossed by many rundles of fire! Some Jacob must have been dreaming. Through those burnished gates a flaming chariot rolls. Some Elijah must be ascending. Mornin I wish I had a rousing bell to wake the whole world up to see it. Every leaf a psalm. Every flower a censor. Every bird a chorister. Every sight beauty. Every sound music. Every transfigured. The skies in conflagration. The air as if seeping down from hanging-gardens of heaven. The foam of the celestial seas plashed on the white tops of the spirea. The honeysuckle on one side my porch challenges the sweet-brier on the other. The odors of heliotrope overflow the urns and flood the garden. Syringas with bridal blooms in their hair, and roses bleeding with a very carnage of joy. Oh, the glories of day-dawn in the country! My pen trembles and my eyes moisten. Unlike the flaming sword that drove out the first pair from Eden, these fiery splendors seem like swords unsheathed by angel hands to drive us in.

There is something in this country air to put one in the best mood. Yesterday we allowed a snake to cross our path without any disposition on our part to kill it. We were at peace with all the world. We would not hurt a spider. We could take our bitterest foe and give him a camp-stool on the piazza. We would not blame him for not liking us, he liked our strawberries. We would walk with him arm-in-arm through the watermelon patch and peach orchard. He would be persuaded that if we could not write good sermons and vivacious lectures, we can nevertheless raise great pumpkins, and long carrots, and drumhead cabbages. We would take him in our carriage, going at consistent ministerial pace, as though on the way to the Old School Presbytery, never ting with any one, if there were danger of our being beaten. We hereby proclaim peace forever with any man who likes our hens. We fear we should have been tempted to sign the railroad of some wrongdoer if he had praised our early races.

Nothing better to calm the nerves than a little work in the garden. A sharp hoe will hack to pieces all your dyspepsia. A pruning-knife will cut off the excrescences of your disposition. The dash of the shower that wets you to the skin will cool your spirit for ecclesiastical strife. Daily swinging the axe will tune up your nerves. Trampling down ha as it is tossed into the mow will tread into forgetfulness our little perplexities. In the wake of the plow you may pick up strength with which to battle public iniquity. Neighbors looking over the fence may think we are only wiling cantaloupes, or splitting rails, or husking corn, when we are rebuilding our strength, enkindling our spirits, quickening our brain, purifying our theology, and blessing our souls.

Congregations would be advantaged by it, if for a few weeks of every year they would allow their pastors a little farm-life. Three weeks at a fashionable watering-place will not do the work. There is not enough salts and sulphur in all the springs to overcome the tight shoes, and the uncomfortable gloves, and the late hours, and the high livin and the dresses economical at the neck. Rather turn us to physical work.

A summer halt in the country is full of suggestion. Born amid harvests and flocks, one always has a full meny to draw upon. David, the Psalmist, on almost every page of his divine poem, reveals that he was a country boy before he became king and poet. David, the shepherd-boy, was observing, beautiful, brave and musical. I think he oft forgot the sheep in his reveries. There in the solitude he plucked the harp-string that is thrilling through all ages. David the boy, was gathering material for David the poet and David the man. David was fond of using his knife among the saplings, and he had noticed the exuding juice of the tree; and when he became a man he said, "The trees of the Lord are full of sap." David, the boy, had been fond of hunting birds and beasts, and he had driven the old stork off the nest to find how many eggs were under her; and when he became a man he said, "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." In boyhood he had heard the terrific thunder-storm that frightened a red deer into premature sickness; and when he became a man he said, "The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds to ve." David, the boy, had lain upon his back, looking up at the stars and examining the sky, and to his boyish imagination the sky seemed like a piece of Divine embroidery, with Divine fingers working in the threads of light and the beads of stars; and he became a man and wrote, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

War in Somaliland

RECENT cable despatches report a new outbreak of fanaticism in Africa. This time it is to the east of the Soudan, in the region immediately south of the Gulf of Aden and the Red Sea. The leader of the outbreak is known as the Mad Mullah. He appears to be desirous of emulating the Mahdi of the Soudan. He levies tribute from the caravans passing through Somaliland to and from the coast and the interior, and is endeavoring to bring all the tribes of the country under his sway. The people are a tall, fine race, active and roist, like the Zulus. They are fierce and lawless, chily Mohammedans, yielding obedience to none but the own tribal chiefs, and indisposed to combine into union. They cultivate the land, but their property consists chiefly in their herds of cattle and camels. It is believed that they are descended from the Arabs who some four or five hundred years ago crossed the Red Sea and settled in Africa. Their liberties have not been abridged, but now they are taking the offensive, and interfering with traffic and commerce, an expedition has been sent against them by England from the Soudan, and by Abyssinia, which joins Somaliland on the northwest. It is believed that the Mad Mullah has undertaken more than he can accomplish, in trying to unite the tribes, and that mutual jealousy will prevent his ever attaining such a flowing as the Mahdi had. It is a pity that they should have aroused the animosity of civilized nations, for there came but one end to a conflict between them and their powerful foes. So long as they were peaceful and inoffensive, they were let alone, but now that they have begun hostilities, the inevitable rest will ensue.

They that take the sword shall perish with the sword (Matt. 26: 52).

A Sailor's Personal

A peculiar method of finding a friend was adopted recently by a sailor belonging to the navy. He obtained leave of absence to visit his relatives ashore. He was glad to find that another sailor from the same vessel, who was his special chum, was to have his leave at the same time. He had agreed to visit this chum and spend the last two days of his leave with him at his home. But first he must go to his own town, to see his own relatives. When the vacation was nearly run out, he set out for the town in which his chum lived. On his arrival there, he discovered to his consternation that the slip of paper on which his chum had written his address was resting in the pocket of the clothes he had left at home. He tried in vain to recall the street and number of his chum's home. He inquired from letter-carriers, policemen and others, but no one knew the man he wanted to find. After debating with himself what course he should pursue, he heard the notes of a rattle with which a clock-peddler was trying to attract customers. The sound suggested to the sailor a way of solving his difficulty. For a small sum he obtained the use of the bugle at intervals, and went into various parts of the town, and on the corners of the streets played his ship's call. Very soon he was rewarded for his ingenuity. A window in one of the houses was thrown up and a familiar voice hailed him bidding him come in. He could not have found a man in that way, but a sailor, as he well knew, would recognize the familiar strain, and would know that it was a sailor who was blowing it. So it should be with the Christian. The language of the kingdom of God should find recognition in the ears of all who belong to the kingdom.

There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian (1 Cor. 14: 9).

A New Pavement

A well-known European scientist has introduced a new method of paving the streets, which promises to supersede stone, asphalt and all other materials. It is called Ceramo-crystal, and is composed chiefly of ground glass, as fine as powder, which, when it is subjected to extreme heat, is compressed under an immense pressure. When it has cooled and hardened it becomes firm, and resists any pressure that can be applied to it. A specimen flagstone of this material was recently tested in Paris, by dropping upon it a weight of two tons. It did not make the slightest impression upon it, and not until the weight was dropped from a great height, for the twentieth time, did a crack appear in the crystal. Neither cold nor heat affects it, and water runs easily from its smooth surface. Preparations are now being made for paving with it some of the busiest streets in the European capitals. If it succeeds there, it will soon come into general use, as it has the qualifications that have long been desired in a paving material. Improvements are continually being made to facilitate rapid and easy locomotion, but in spiritual matters the facilities that God has provided are too wagon, the doctor pronounced the case one of small-pox. As the servant had not had the disease, the doctor forbade him approaching the wagon. Two days afterwards the doctor told the servant that his master was dead, and as the disease was infectious, bade him dig a grave under a tree on a hillside. The servant saw the doctor lower the body into the grave and cover it with some loose boards, and he so informed the insurance companies, adding that he had himself filled up the grave. In the confession the doctor now makes, he says that in the night he lengthened the grave, carrying it under the heavy underbrush. When the supposed dead man was lowered into it and the boards were put in place, he crawled out of the grave beneath the underbrush and lay still while his servant filled up the grave, and the next night made his escape. The policies were then collected and the money divided. The fraud would have escaped detection if it had not been that the supposed dead man was seen and recognized about a year later. He eluded arrest, however; but the doctor who had helped him was not so fortunate. It may be hoped that the man who feigned death will repent of his evil deeds and find pardon through Christ, so that when he really dies and is buried he will escape in a different way from the power of the grave.

He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live (John 11: 25).

A Bottomless Bog

A railroad company which is making extensive improvements on its line, has encountered a difficult problem about two miles from Hartford, Conn. It is a sink hole, which has already cost an immense sum in efforts to make it solid. About thirty-five years ago, when the road was constructed, hundreds of tons of timber and refuse were cast into the hole and gradually sank away. Finally a roadbed was established over the hole, about one hundred and twenty-five feet in width, which, to all appearance, was substantial. Now, after thirty-five years of sustaining hundreds of heavy trains, the spot has begun to sink again, and promises to be as troublesome as in former years. While the working crew was engaged in raising the track at this point a few days ago and dirt was being dumped into the place, a gradual subsidence was discovered, and when a big mogul engine pulled up and stopped on the "sink" the ground under the track sank almost twelve inches and the big machine almost toppled over before it could be pulled off. Workmen say that the rails over the place in one night sank below the level of the road-bed more than two feet, and when trains pulled over it the rails yielded like rubber. A watchman is kept at the spot night and day, and all trains are required to cross at a low rate of speed. In his Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan gives a similar description of the Slough of Despond, into which, he says, "millions of wholesome instructions had been cast to make good ground of the place," but without success. In that case, however, it is consolatory to know that there is always a way of escape for those who fall into it.

He brought me up, out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock (Ps. 40: 2).

BRIEF NOTES

The recent census of the British Isles shows that the present population of Great Britain and Ireland is 41,454,578, an increase of 3,721,656 over the census of 1891.

The India balance sheet just made up by the British Government shows that the amount spent last year in the relief of sufferers by the famine was $61,950,000. It was expended chiefly in the relief camps and in the hospitals.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman has been seriously ill with an affection of the heart, similar to that which proved fatal to Mr. D. L. Moody. For three days his life was despaired of, but at the time of writing the physicians are beginning to entertain hopes of his recovery.

Mr. John Willis Baer stated, at the recent Christian Endeavor Convention, that there are now 61,427 Christian Endeavor Societies, with an aggregate membership of over four millions. At the Convention ten years ago, the numbers were 16,274 societies and less than one million members.

King Oscar, of Sweden, is entitled to a life-saving medal. While walking the streets of Copenhagen during his recent visit to the King of Denmark, he saw a lady on a bicycle fall under the feet of a horse. He ran forward, and with one hand stopped the horse, while with the other he drew the lady out of her perilous position.

A Strange Fraud

An extraordinary charge was made in the District Court of Fort Scott, Kan., recently, against a physician. He was placed on trial for aiding a man to obtain eight thousand dollars from three insurance companies by a pretended death. The evidence against him was so conclusive, that the prisoner made a full confession in the hope of gaining a mitigation of sentence. He said that the man insured was in urgent need of money, and the physician himself was not averse to making some. The plan was concocted, and the share of each in the proceeds was arranged. The man then started on a journey in a wagon accompanied by a servant. When he had reached a lonely place, he pretended to fall ill, and sent the servant back for the doctor. On his arrival at the place where the supposed sick man lay in the 5th International Convention of the Epworth League

...THE GREAT METHODIST
YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETY TO ASSEMBLE THIS WEEK IN SAN FRANCISCO, CAL...

THE ALHAMBRA

MECHANICS' PAVILION, CHIEF PLACE OF ASSEMBLY

A STREET IN CHINATOWN

FOR members of the Epworth League, and for the city of San Francisco, this will be a memorable week. Probably the beautiful city of the Golden Gate never had so many Methodists within its borders as are now there and on their way there, to keep tryst with their brethren and sisters of the great organization of the Epworth League. Congratulations are in order, first to the League, on having so attractive a city for the scene of its Fifth International Convention, and secondly, to the city, in entertaining so enthusiastic and aggressive a body of young Christians. Such assemblies are stimulating to religious life, wherever they are held, and give an impetus to the spiritual work of the churches. They prove to the world that religion is a reality, a vital force, which stands for something in the lives of people who will travel long distances and incur expense and inconvenience in order to take part in discussion of spiritual matters.

On our first page is a picture of the interior of Mechanics' Pavilion, in which the principal meetings of the Convention will be held. It is an enormous building, capable of seating eight thousand persons, and when it is filled with such an audience as that of the delegates of the Leagues of the United States, Canada, and foreign lands, it is a most impressive spectacle. With this picture are portraits of Mr. Phelan, the Mayor of San Francisco, who will welcome the delegates on behalf of the city, and of two leading Epworth Leaguers who have devoted themselves to the work of preparing for the Convention. On this page are pictures of interesting scenes in San Francisco, and a portrait of Bishop Joyce, the President of the Board of Control of the Epworth League.

The Convention will hold its first session on Thursday, July 18, and from that time until Sunday evening, July 21, when the farewell session will be held, there will be little leisure time for

The Church and the Liquor Question; The Church and the Workingman; The Church and the Young Man; The Church and the Newspaper; Sabbath Desecration and the Institutional Church. On these subjects able speakers are on the list for the simultaneous meetings. In the afternoon, the discussion turns on the forward movements within the Church: The Results Achieved, The Work Ahead, Personal Work, The Work of the Layman, Systematic Benevolence, How to Use the Bible, etc. In the evening there is a choice of topics: A Missionary Mass Meeting at Mechanics' Pavilion; The Christian Citizen's Duties, at Woodward's Pavilion and the Christ Life in the New Century, at Metropolitan Temple.

Saturday is to be devoted to the departments. After the Sunrise Prayer Meetings, the Junior League Rally is to be held. The Literary and Spiritual Department and the League Devotional meeting will be discussed, with the view of obtaining suggestions for increasing their efficiency. Another session will take up the Social and Mercy and Help Departments, while a fourth section will consist of a Conference of Chapter Officers at which eminent officers, who have become experts in their work, will speak. In the afternoon a grand mass meeting will be held in Golden Gate Park, to be followed by a band concert. The evening will be given up to State rallies.

Sunday, the closing day, will open with Love Feast services, led by divines famous in the church, whose names are household words in every Methodist family. Visiting delegates will occupy the pulpits of the churches of the city at the morning service. In the afternoon there will be a children's mass meeting in Woodward Pavilion, and devotional services in various churches. In the evening, four Praise Services will be held, at which addresses will be given by famous pulpit orators, and each service any conscientious Epworth Leaguer in the city. Not only will there be three meetings each day, but there will be three meetings going on simultaneously, morning, afternoon and evening, thus enabling the delegate to make a choice of the meetings he prefers to attend. The meetings other than those in the Mechanics' Pavilion are to be held in Woodward's Pavilion and in the Metropolitan Temple.

According to the provisional programme which has been prepared, the first session on Thursday will be Communion services, held simultaneously in three churches at eleven A. M. In the afternoon, in Mechanics' Pavilion there will be a welcome meeting, at which it is expected that addresses will be made by the Governor of California, the Mayor of San Francisco, Bishop Hamilton and Dr. Simmons. The responses will be made by Bishop Joyce, Bishop Candler of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, N. W. Howell Esq. of Canada, and Bishop Williams of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. In the evening, three meetings will be held to discuss topics suggested by the beginning of the new century. Young People's Movements in the last century, and in the present century, and Twentieth Century Methodism, are the three central topics, and suitable leaders have been assigned to each topic at each meeting.

On Friday, the engagements of the day begin with four Sunrise Prayer Meetings at 6.30 in various churches. At eight o'clock, the Convention will take up the most important of all the subjects in the programme. This is the social relations of the Church and the individual Christian. Among the divisions of the topic are:

will conclude with a solemn Consecration Meeting, as an appropriate farewell. In the familiar phrase of the Church, this is "a feast of fat things," and will surely draw to the Convention every Epworth Leaguer who can make it possible to attend. The programme is only provisional, but we may be quite sure that it will be no change in an arrangement so well considered and so skilfully balanced, except such as may be absolutely necessary. It shows how clearly the members have perceived the problems that are moving men's minds, and the need the League has to keep itself in touch with the strenuous American life of to-day. The rest of the conference on such topics cannot be otherwise than helpful, and it will assuredly be felt in the cities of our broad land when the delegates return to their homes.

It would, we suppose, be heresy to say that the Epworth League, like the Christian Endeavor and other young people's societies, is on its trial, but there can be no doubt in the minds of careful observers that it would be wise to prepare for a time of strain. When the novelty of a new movement has worn off, there is apt to be a decrease of interest, and a falling away of people whom Christ pictured as ground hearers, who receive a new thing with joy, but having no root, soon wither away. It behooves the leaders in all these societies to keep them from drifting into a mechanical, perfunctory condition, by adopting new methods and opening up new lines of work. That is one of the best services such conventions as this can render, because they afford opportunities for suggestion and discussion and an exchange of experiences which must be mutually beneficial.

A PEEP AT HOLLAND FOLK

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MAIRON FROM MIDDLEBURG

GOOD patriots as we Americans are, we have a sentiment of chivalry which is easily aroused, and, just as we held in tender regard the aged Queen of England, and lamented her death with the loyalty of her own people, we hold in loving admiration the young Queen of the Netherlands, Wilhelmina. For a long time we called her the little queen, as we had a right to do, having watched her growing up, and taking an interest in her health, her prospects and her education, having also heartily approved the wise management of her sensible mother. Now that she is no longer entitled to the diminutive, we are still of those who care about her comings and goings, and who wish her well, and hope for her a long and happy reign.

Idyllic Holland has a red, white, and blue flag, the colors, like our own, symbolizing intense love of liberty, and determination to maintain it to the death. Red for life-blood, white for purity, blue for truth, what truer banner can be finer for a banner under which brave men and fair women are to live and die. Holland, the holiest land, was redeemed from the encroaching, menacing, perilous sea by a thousand years of stubborn strife, a long struggle, during which the dykes were built to protect the country from the incursions of ocean tides and river floods. Speaking precisely, Holland is one of eleven provinces which compose the kingdom of the Netherlands. At home, the Hollanders number four millions of people. Abroad, in their numerous colonies, the Dutch nation rules many thousands of brown and yellow peoples, not with the iron hand of despotism, but ever with toleration, justice, and discretion and also with a thrift which makes the Dutchman rich. The whole world has looked on in wonder and sympathy at the unequal conflict in South Africa, where the Boers, descendants of the Hollanders, a peace-loving people, have resisted so manfully, in the effort to preserve their republican order, the mighty onslaught of Great Britain. Perseverance and pluck are inborn in the Dutch and their descendants everywhere. At forty years, in the long ago, Spain gave up her effort to conquer Holland.

Perhaps the characteristic which first occurs to us when we think of the Dutch, is their cleanliness. The houses of Holland are beautifully, brightly, and invariably spotless. No Dutch matron can tolerate dirt within her borders, and the windows fairly twinkle, the doorsteps shine, the floors gleam with polishing and scouring, and the towns reflect the neatness of the separate houses. Some credit must be given to the fact, that the noble housewives have plenty of water; but water would not accomplish the dainty results it does without these of the mop, the broom, and the resolute human hand and hand to wield them. We owe to the Dutch one article of common use, which we would not know how to do without, namely, starch. Dr. Wm. Elliot Griffis tells us that to the Dutch we are indebted for the thimble, that little finger-helmet being their invention, and that we must thank them, too, for the shirt, nightgown, bed-tick, pocket-handkerchief, tablecloth, napkin, and sheets, these indispensable adjuncts to our modern comfort originating with the clever Netherlands, in the thirteenth century. As we look back a few hundred years, and note how poor and limited were the resources of our ancestors in the most commonplace domestic lines of luxury, we cannot but rejoice that we were not born too soon.

The Dutch are plodding and patient. No one can hurry these sober, placid, and home-loving people. In the faces of the grave, middle-aged women, of the innocent young girls, in the rosy children, we read amiability, decision, kindness, and love for hearth and home. The peasant dress is the same from age to age, the brooch, the ear-rings, the buckles, are family heirlooms, handed down from mother to daughter. The head-dress, the sash, the bodice, the quaint skirt, the gay colors or the sombre hues, belong to history, and are indicative of the district or the province where the people reside. It would be the greatest of pities should that happen in Holland which here in New York we constantly see among our immigrant population, peasant families laying aside their beautiful and distinctive garb, and assuming the fashionable dress of the period, often as inconvenient as it is unbecoming.

Dutch art has immortalized the fireside. Dutch painters are realists, investing the cradle, the homely hearth, the mother, the betrothal, or the village wedding with the beauty of their loving study. A Dutchman of to-day, Marten Maartens, has written several very remarkable novels, not in better. Certainly her feeling indicated a high regard for books, placing them in the same rank with jewels, crystals, and fine stuffs, which we do not expose to careless depredations or injuries.

Everywhere in Holland one catches the gleam of the church spire, and hears the pleasant tolling of the church bell. Our own country, wherever Dutch occupation preceded any other, shows the same domination of the steeple and the chimes. John Fiske, in his delightful story of the Dutch and Quaker colonies in America, pays a high tribute to the gain the country made in her early days, by the coming hither of the Holland element.

One other fine trait belongs to the Dutch, and that is their reverence for the family bond. Fickleness and disdain of the marriage tie are not peculiarities of the Dutch character. They are inherently loyal and faithful, rear large families in the fear of God and in honesty toward men; are simple, straightforward, and genial, people who win our respect and retain our esteem.

Now that women are busy in making up their programmes for next winter's study in their literary clubs, why might not some of them map out a course of reading of Dutch history, Dutch commerce, Dutch art, and Dutch folklore? There would be a chance for much variety, and the afternoons of a club season could be thus turned to good advantage.

It is interesting to discover that the floriculture for which Holland is renowned is a far cry back to the crusaders of the Middle Ages. When the Crusaders came trailing home from their holy wars, they brought from the East seeds, roots, bulbs, and flowers, which grew apace in the soil of Europe. The moist soil of the Netherlands proved just what the Oriental blooms most preferred. "Indeed," says Dr. Griffis, in Brave Little Holland, "the tulip not only drove the serious Dutchman mad, but in the sixteenth century all the world went wild over the bulbs of Haarlem. Even to-day, the drained lands left by the pumped-out lake of Haarlem is the best for bulbs of any land in the world. Whereas, in other parts of Nederland, farms do not usually pay over four per cent. on the money invested, the Haarlem bulb-lands yield a revenue of twelve per cent. per annum. New varieties of these brilliant exotics are continually developed. One of the latest, named the Abraham Lincoln, is the direct descendant of an Asiatic ancestor brought westward three centuries ago."

Still further to quote Dr. Griffis, whose loving researches with Dutch history have made him an authority, "Dutch captains making voyages to tropical countries were ordered to bring home seeds, bulbs, roots, and cuttings. From their settlements in Brazil, the Hudson River region, South Africa, the Spice Islands, Formosa, Japan, and Asiatic lands, many new plants were introduced, first into Holland and then into all the gardens of the Western world."

The pretty girls of Holland, plump rather than slim, are apt to develop into buxom and solid matrons, taking on flesh with time. Solidity is a feature of these women and men of the brave little country which fought so strenuous a battle with the sea, and won it in the end.

At a woman's club luncheon not long ago, a guest who had recently returned from Europe, displayed a duplicate set of china, cream-jug, sugar-bowl, cups and saucers, all exactly patterned after the breakfast set of Queen Wilhelmina. It was of Dutch ware, made for the royal bride, and, after a few sets were manufactured, the mould was broken. Therefore, the lady was very much pleased with her treasured souvenir of a visit to the Hague.

A GROUP OF FISHER-FOLK

his own tongue, but in English, one of them, God's Fool, having a claim to live, beyond mere transient popularity, among the books that became classics. Incidentally, this romance paints Dutch daily life in strong colors.

Fishing is naturally a flourishing industry among the Hollanders, and the fisher-folk, living by the sea, and winning their bread from its waves, are strong, simple-hearted, and brave. Sometimes the men are out all night buffeting wind and storm; sometimes the wife's candle burns late, that her good man may be lighted in with his hardy-won spoils. Very quaint and sweet are the little children of the fishing hamlet, with their blue eyes, freckled skins, and dimpled cheeks. Not only the catching of fresh fish, but the drying and salting of fish for export goes on in some of the thrifty provinces of Holland.

In winter, the canals which intersect the land are alive with skaters. Women skate to market and to make friendly calls. Children skate to and from school. Burgomasters skate to the council-board. Merchants and mechanics skate to business. Lovers and sweethearts skate for the pleasure of each other's company. Skating is the very poetry of motion, and nothing can be more exhilarating, nor more fascinating than the open-air life on the ice, which goes gaily on during the winter. From the queen to the lowliest dairy-maid, every woman skates, and little tots just beginning to walk are fitted with skates as with shoes, that they may be adepts in the graceful national accomplishment.

The Hollanders are an intensely religious, as well as a liberty-loving people. Going to church is not only a duty, but a privilege. The habit of nicety extends to many small details, and as a Puritan lady of old Salem or Boston carried her sprigs of Southern wood and lavender to meeting, folded in her fine Sunday handkerchief, the Dutch matron of the present carries her Bible wrapped in a square of embroidered linen. A Dutch friend once remonstrated with me for keeping valuable books on shelves, where they were liable to dust and warping from heat. "In Holland," she said, "I kept such volumes in a chest, carefully protected from injury." She did not understand the desire to have books within reach of the hand, where they might so easily be guarded

ON THE WAY TO CHURCH

A YOUNG GIRL FROM MARKEN

A TYPICAL RUSSIAN PLEASANT

JOHN OF CRONSTADT, THE CZAR'S ALMONER

LOUIS E. VAN NORMAN

THE ALMONER OF THE CZAR

BY...
LOUIS E.
VAN NORMAN

IT has been said that there are two—and only two—Russian subjects whom the Imperial Government allows to do just as they please and with whom it really fears to interfere. These two are Count Leo Tolstoi and "Father" John, of Cronstadt. The recently excommunicated thinker, reformer and author, who is living his philosophy at Yasnaya Polyana, is one of the glories of Russia. The saintly little sweet-faced pastor who exemplifies the power and beauty of a life of prayer, has made Cronstadt the centre, the pivot, the Mecca of the love of the Russian people.

One beautiful morning in September I drove up to the Nicolai Railroad station in Moscow. It was very near train time, and I became somewhat impatient when the droshky stopped nearly a block from the station. A great crowd was surging about the building. Presently a cordon of gendarmes formed at the entrance and gradually spread out, forming a lane or road from the building to the other side of the street.

THE CATHEDRAL, CRONSTADT

"What is it?" I asked a military officer nearby. "Pere Jeauvien," he answered, surprised at my second question. "It is always like this."

In a few moments, a spare little man, in the garb of the Russian Church, with gray hair and beard, but a singularly beautiful face, with clear, pink skin, came out of the station and walked quickly through the gendarmes to the carriage which stood waiting for him. The crowd was literally on its tiptoes, and surging forward persistently. An elegant carriage forced its way through the crush and a richly-dressed lady, evidently of exalted rank, alighted. The police made way respectfully. On foot she proceeded to the carriage in which sat the little cleric. She seized his hand and kissed it reverently. He leaned over, spread his hands above her head and blessed her. Then he turned and said something to the police. Immediately a commotion arose in the crowd. One by one they were permitted to approach the carriage and kiss his hand. After the lady came two dirty moujiks, one still holding the pick with which he had been working on the railroad. The little pastor in the carriage pulled out from a bag a bundle of what looked like yellow paper, and began to hand out bits of it rapidly to the crowd. I jumped out of the droshky and pressed closer. He was giving out three-ruble notes ($1.50 each) so quickly that I could not keep count of them. I found myself again near the polite military officer, and he volunteered further explanations.

"Pastor John has been called to Moscow," he said, "to pray for the Princess A— (naming a lady high in aristocratic circles), who is ill. She has sent him a sum of money—probably three or four hundred rubles—for his work, and you see how he is using it."

The incident was typical of the famous priest's work and methods. John Ilyitch Sergieff, of the Russo-Greek Cathedral of St. Andrew's, Cronstadt, the man whom all Russia believes in and loves, is the general almoner of the Empire. When a rich man wants to give money for a benevolent or charitable object, and does not know just how or where to bestow it, he gives it unreservedly and absolutely to the little Russo-Greek pastor, who distributes it wisely and with scrupulous unselfishness. Millions of rubles pass through his hands every year; yet he is a poor man. He lives humbly, and even denies himself many of what we might call the necessities of life. Boats and trains in which he journeys are so besieged by crowds that he has to ask police aid in getting to his destination. When he comes to St. Petersburg the news spreads like wildfire, and crowds run madly to get near his presence, to receive his blessing, or to beg his attendance on sick relatives or friends.

His power in prayer is believed in all over Russia, and many instances of answers to prayer, resulting in the cure of sick persons, are cited. Many of the cures are almost incredible. The little pastor, however, repudiates any connection with "faith-healers." Sometimes, he believes, sickness is God's messenger, sent to work certain changes in us. "I will pray," he says simply; "I will pray, but God will do as he sees best."

Father John was with the late Czar, Alexander III., at his death. In his own simple words he describes the last moments of the Emperor. I copy from the St. Petersburg Church News:

On the 17th of October, 1904, in accordance with his desire, I administered the Holy Sacrament to his Imperial Majesty.

On the 20th of October he wished to see me again. I hastened to him immediately and remained in his presence till the moment of his death. By the wish of the Empress, I read the prayer for healing the patient, and anointed him with oil. The Emperor expressed the wish that I should lay my hands on his head, and when I had done so he said to me: "The people love you." "Yes," I answered, "your people love me." Then the Emperor said: "Yes; because they know who you are and what you are." "Is it not oppressive to your Majesty when I hold my hands on your head?" I asked. "No," the Emperor answered; "I feel better when you hold your hands over me."

It was a beautiful day in October when I sailed down the Neva to Cronstadt to visit this remarkable man. His home is a little, plain gray house, behind a modest wooden fence. Yet there dwells the man who commands more real reverence and could wield more real power than the ruler of 130 millions. "I generally arise before dawn," he said, in answer to my question. "Then I spend half an hour in meditation and prayer." Scarcely can he leave for the cathedral before his door is besieged with the sick and the poor, and often with messengers from the rich requesting his presence. It is impossible to listen to everyone; so, with a word of comfort here and a bit of advice there, he makes his way to his droshky and drives to church. After service there are his regular visits to the sick, the suffering, the dying. At home, dozens—sometimes hundreds—of letters await him, many requiring immediate answer, some asking his presence in a far distant city, all demanding thought.

The Cathedral of St. Andrew, in Cronstadt, is a quaint, beautiful old church. Its most striking feature to a visitor are the six exquisitely painted pictures of six of the Russian patriarchs. The figures are so wonderfully executed that they have a really spiritual, unearthly expression. They force one to believe, however empty some of the forms of the Orthodox Russo-Greek Church may seem to-day, it certainly has had a grand past.

The good pastor has written a book—a compilation of "edifying thoughts and feelings," which has recently been translated into English. It is entitled My Life in Christ, and it is a strange mingling of medieval mysticism and nineteenth century "practicalness."

Fervent, tearful prayer, he writes, not only delivers the heart from sin, but it also cures bodily maladies and infirmities. It renews the whole being of a man. I speak from experience. What a priceless gift is prayer.

On the other hand, he says:

Forced prayer develops hypocrisy, renders a man incapable of any occupation requiring meditation, and makes him slothful in everything, even in fulfilling his duties.

His remarks on the "rules of life" are like proverbs. Here are a few:

The greatest gift of God is peace or rest of heart.

In all caprices, all offences, all manner of family unquietness, always sincerely blame yourself. Acknowledge yourself as the real cause of the unpleasantness. "It was all my fault," and the house will be healed, and our first love and honor will return. Know nothing at home but more love.

Everything passes except love. Love is eternal.

Guard by every means your heart, or the sincerity of your heart. Your capability of sympathizing with your neighbors in their joys and sorrows. Avoid as you would mortal poison any indifference and coldness to people, various misfortunes, sicknesses and needs.

The science of sciences is to know our passions, to know how to conquer and expel them. It is a great science not to be angry with any one or with anything; not to think evil of anyone, not even if he has done us evil, but to find an excuse for him in ourselves, or in something else. It is a great science to despise gain and praise and luxury, to live temperately and moderately in all things.

A life of high ideals and simple Christian faith such is the example of John of Cronstadt.

Performed 1,500 Marriages and 2,500 Baptisms

Editor of The Christian Herald: I was interested in the article appearing in your issue of May 8, concerning Rev. Mr. Meese, of Auburn, Ind., who married 1,500 couples. The Rev. Abram Van Horne was pastor of the Fonda Reformed Church from 1795 to 1880. He preached in both the Dutch and English languages, and with his pastorate the former language was to be heard from the pulpit. The church records show that he officiated at 1,500 marriages and 2,500 baptisms. Sir William C. Van Horne, of Milwaukee, is a grandson of Rev. Abram Van Horne, and during the month of April he visited another son of the same clergyman—Mr. Giles H. Van Horne, who, with his family, still resides at Fonda. At the opening of the century, when population was still so sparse, the record of 1,500 marriages cut on Dominie Van Horne's tombstone, as remarkable an item indeed.

His Life for His Friend

A BEAUTIFUL instance of voluntary sacrifice is related by the Christian Commonwealth. The door of St. Leonard's Church, Northampton, England, was left open, and two boys wandering in were tempted to climb up into the upper part, and scramble beam to beam. All at once a joist gave way. The beam on which they were standing became displaced. The elder had just time to jump when falling, while the younger, clinging over his body, caught hold of his companion's legs. In this position the poor lad hung, crying vainly for help, for no one was near. At length the boy clinging to the beam became exhausted. He could no longer support the double weight. He called out to the lad below that they were both done for. "Did you save yourself if I were to loose you?" replied the little lad. "I think I could," replied the other. "Then, good-bye, and God bless you!" cried the little fellow, loosing his hold and dropping to instant death.

Born Again in War Time

How Mary A. Livermore, a Christian from Childhood, First Realized the True Spiritual Life

...BY...
REV. LOUIS
ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

MARY A. LIVERMORE is one of the most widely known and universally revered and loved woman in America. She has had a long and brilliant career. Her friends celebrated recently in Melrose, Mass., her eightieth birthday. But she is not eighty years old; she is rather eighty years young. Her life has been one long career of helpfulness and blessing to mankind. During the Civil War, when the nation's resources were tried to the uttermost to keep soldiers to the front, Mary A. Livermore was one of the very strongest and sanest personalities which the great emergency brought forward. For months and years she toiled, almost night and day, and worked miracles in bringing a woman's mercy and tenderness to the bedside of sick, and wounded, and dying soldiers, in camps last he invited us all to his house for an afternoon tea, and planned the visit so well that not one failed to be present. It was a delightful occasion, but withal very earnest and serious, for our good minister pressed home upon us the duty we owed to the church, our parents and ourselves, until we became sensitive to it, and promised performance of it. We conferred with our parents, who heartily acquiesced, and on a beautiful day in spring we were baptized, and received into the membership of the church. We have remained friends through life, although widely scattered, and variously occupied. Three still tarry on earth. One is the widow of a prominent clergyman, whose son has followed in his father's footsteps, and is a well-known, scholarly minister of the day. The other is the mother of a missionary son and daughter, toiling in India, while of myself I can only say, I have always tried to know the truth and to perform my duty."

What a beautiful window that is into the early life and the sources of power of this great and splendid woman.

In another letter, Mrs. Livermore says to me: "During the Civil War, when I had unusual experiences in the work of the Sanitary Commission, I seemed almost to have been 'born again.' For the first time in my life I comprehended what ministers mean by the phrase, 'The exceeding sinfulness of sin.' I understood as never before, that wrongdoing, whether by an individual or a nation, must inevitably be followed by punishment. I saw most clearly that Christ taught us, in the parable that closes the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, that helpfulness to man is holiness toward God; and that to help our brother and to love him, despite his imperfections, is as essential to Christian life as to love God, and whatever is good and true. The largeness and divineness of the Christian religion became apparent to me; a keener comprehension of right and wrong developed within me; and I saw that the Golden Rule is as fundamental in the world of duty and happiness, as is Newton's law of gravitation in the world of matter. My life since the war has been very different from what it was before. Neither prayer, praise, worship, nor meditation make up the Christian life. They are aids to it. Christianity is not simply a matter of belief; it is a life, a battle. 'Not words but deeds,' for 'by their fruits shall ye know them.'" and hospitals. She might well be called the American Florence Nightingale of that period.

Because of her glorious deeds, and her fruits of righteousness, a whole generation rise up and call Mary A. Livermore "blessed."

The source of this strong and beautiful life, which has been such a great blessing to two generations, was in a Christian childhood. Mary Livermore's father and mother were members of the Baptist Church in Boston for nearly sixty years. They gave their children the best education afforded by the times, but they were still more anxious that their children should become Christians.

In a recent letter from Mrs. Livermore, written only a few weeks ago, she says: "The children in my father's house were so religiously trained, that we gravitated toward church membership irresistibly. We were under the constant influence of my father and mother, and they allowed no one to supersede them in matters of religious instruction and training. It was too austere, but that was the fault of those days. And while I have unlearned much that I was taught in early life, as every one is likely to do, the essential truths of my religious education are immortal, and will abide with me forever. If it be a good thing to have ingrained in one's nature so vital a faith in God, right, duty and immortality, that no accident of life can destroy it, or annul its control of one's conduct, then I have a great cause for gratitude to my father and mother."

"There were eighteen young girls in the parish, who were similarly situated as myself. We were friends and school-mates, not one was sixteen years old, and all were harnessed into the activities of the church in various small ways. Our beloved pastor and friend, Rev. Dr. R. H. Neale, minister of the First Baptist Church of Boston for nearly half a century, repeatedly urged us to unite with the church, but we always hesitated, from the fear that we were not 'good enough.' RECOLLECTIONS OF THE OLD PATRIOT
BY ONE WHO KNEW HIM IN THE FIELD

WASHINGTON, July 4.—The man who, under Providence, has had most to do with ending the power of Spain on the continent which Columbus discovered, is now visiting the United States. Spain's power in time would have ended, because she had shown her inability to keep step with the progress of civilized nations, but it was given to General Maximo Gomez to be the instrument most potent in carrying out that which was decreed. The old chief of two insurrections is now getting acquainted with the American people, in whose friendship he always has trusted. It was the dream of General Gomez to see Cuba a free, progressive country, and thanks to the United States that dream may be realized in his old age. His hope and his ambition always were that the island should secure something more than political freedom. He wanted it released from the grinding heel of ecclesiastical domination, which was one of the mainstays of an oppressive government. That wish, too, is realized in his old age, for in Cuba since the American control there has been not simply religious toleration, but absolute equality of worship. This principle is embodied in the Cuban constitution, which, in all probability, will go into effect within the next twelve months, and under which Cuba will try the experiment of governing herself.

I think General Maximo Gomez in many respects is the most remarkable man the West Indies has produced, not excepting even Toussaint L'Ouverture, the hero of the Haytian blacks, or Antonio Maceo, who, in the Cuban wars, proved himself to be a great military chieftain.

As is well known, General Gomez is not a native of Cuba. His blood is of pure Spanish origin, and he was born in the island of San Domingo, when it, too, was a Spanish province. Because he was not a native-born Cuban, and yet took part in Cuba's struggles for liberty, General Gomez sometimes has been called a professional revolutionist. It would be just as fair to class Baron Steuben, Kosciuszko, the Polish hero, and Lafayette as professional revolutionists, when they came to the colonies to aid the struggling patriots in the war for independence. In the Ten Years' War, which lasted from 1868 to 1878, and of which General Gomez was the central figure, he made every sacrifice to free Cuba without reward. In the last insurrection he gave even more than his services, for one of his sons fell fighting by the side of Maceo.

General Gomez is something like the late General W. T. Sherman. He is as gruff and as harsh and as irritable as "Old Tecumseh" ever was, but it is only when softness and good nature are likely to be dangerous to the cause in which he is enlisted. He is a poor man to-day, though he might have had uncounted riches. Whatever he has, any of the Cuban insurgents who with him endured the hardships of fighting against Spain's power may always share.

One time last winter I heard a story in Havana which illustrates his kindness to those who suffered with him. Some one discovered that there was no fodder in the stable for his horse, and asked the reason. The reason was quite simple. A Cuban guajiro, or peasant, who had served under Gomez, was in dire poverty and could find no hay for his pony. The pony is part of the life of a Cuban countryman. He will part with anything sooner than it. This former insurgent presented himself to his old chief and told the General his trouble. Without more ado all the fodder which General Gomez had was given to the countryman.

General Gomez is often called "the old Chinaman," because he really looks like a Chinaman. His eyes are small and piercing, and he always wears glasses. The only thing military about him is his mustache. But his looks do not show his full strength of character. His frame is wiry and well knit. His followers tell wonderful tales of his ability to endure great physical fatigue. During the campaigns, he would do his marching in the early morning and late in the evening, always resting his men in the middle of the day. This is an absolute necessity in the tropics, but people from other climates are a long time in learning it. I have been told by both Americans and Cubans who were with General Gomez during the insurrection, that, no matter how hotly they might be pressed by the Spanish troops, he always would insist on this midday rest. Almost invariably he would take his own "siesta" or nap in a hammock. He also did much of his writing in the hammock, and he was a great writer, and still is for that matter. Not only his military orders, but letters to his sister, to his wife and to his children usually were written while he was resting in the hammock. These letters to his family, some of which from time to time were published, show him at his best.

General Gomez sometimes has been charged with ingratitude to the American people; but I do not know on what such charges could be based. He always showed the warmest appreciation of the aid extended by the United States, and when Dr. Klopsch went to Cuba with the funds raised through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the aid of the reconcentrados, warm words of thankfulness came from the woods in the interior, where General Gomez, with a few hundred of his followers, had their headquarters, and were keeping at bay the army of Spain.

Though essentially a soldier, General Gomez has many of the qualities of a statesman. He destroyed property in making war, because it was better than destroying human life, and it served the purposes of the insurrection better.

After the intervention of the United States and the war with Spain had made Cuba free, the majority of the Cubans were filled with an intense desire to make reprisals on the Spaniards. This was a natural feeling, but un-Christian and dangerous to the future peace and prosperity of the island. When the feeling of vengeance was strongest, General Gomez risked his own popularity by antagonizing it. He began preaching the doctrine of peace and concord between Spaniards and Cubans, and urging their joint efforts to rebuild their ruined country. At first his own followers were sullen, but he sternly rebuked their resentments, and insisted that animosities should be forgotten. It was one of the things which showed that he had no sympathy with wreaking revenge for past injuries, and that he could look into the future far enough to see the necessity of all classes in Cuba being welded together in the pursuit of the common welfare.

General Gomez's age is a secret and a well-kept secret. If he has one vanity, it is that of not losing the physical and mental vigor of middle age; and while he delights to be called "the old Chinaman," it displeases him to be considered an old man. He gives the impression that he is in the sixties, yet Cubans who know his history say that he is past seventy, and is, in fact, about the age of President Diaz of Mexico. Whatever his actual age may be, General Gomez does not consider himself too old to learn, and what he learns while in the United States assuredly will be utilized for the benefit of Cuba. He never hesitates to tell the Cubans where he thinks they are wrong.

CHARLES M. PEPPER.

Twenty Years in Union Work

A "RECOGNITION RECEPTION" was given recently by the congregation and Sunday School of the Union Evangelical Church, Corona, New York City, to its pastor, Rev. William Jay Peck, on the completion of his twentieth year as pastor of an undenominational church. It is the only one of its kind in New York City, and probably the oldest in the country. June 13, 1881, he began work. A few scattering members from the Presbyterian, Reformed, Episcopal, and other evangelical churches put in their letters and formed a union church, where the sittings were to be "forever free," the building being generously given by Mr. C. P. Leverich, of New York, expressly for "Union work." Corona is a suburb of the great metropolis. Now it is an active church and Sunday School centre. Mary E. Page gathered five children on her piazza thirty-two years ago, and told them Bible stories. As the sequel of that humble effort, 3,831 Sunday School scholars have been enrolled since the Union Church's organization. Twenty denominations and fifteen nationalities are represented in this unique church. It has been blessed by many revival seasons. The pastor believes in the prevalence of an unremitting revival spirit, and the Sunday School, with its hundreds of boys and girls, has been the church's recruiting ground. At the recent celebration fraternal addresses were made by Rev. Thomas Douglas, Presbyterian; Rev. E. A. Campbell, Methodist; Rev. Charles Clearwater, Reformed; Rev. Charles Keevil, Baptist; Rev. William Hendrickson, Rev. Sidney Barrett, Rev. Robert Trevorrow, Rev. James Coote, Dr. Badger, Dr. A. C. Combes, and Mr. C. D. Leverich. The latter, in closing his speech, presented to the pastor a handsome gold watch and chain, the gift of the congregation and Sunday School.

A Veteran at Rest

AN active, busy, useful life closed on June 30, when Dr. Byron Sunderland passed away at his son's home in the Catskills. For nearly half a century he had been pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Washington, D. C., and during that period had filled, besides, many responsible and honorable offices in religious and philanthropic spheres. He was eighty-two years of age, and his death comes as the patriarch described it, "like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season."

Dr. Sunderland was a New Englander by birth. He was educated at Middlebury College and at Union Theological Seminary. His first charge was at Batavia, N. Y., where he settled in 1843. Eight years later he removed to Syracuse, N. Y., whence, after a successful pastorate of two years, he went to Washington to begin that long course of brilliant service with which his name will be chiefly identified. During that eventful period Dr. Sunderland came in close contact with the leaders of the nation, and his influence, always tactfully exerted, had greater effect than any one knew. During the Civil War, Dr. Sunderland was Chaplain of the Senate and was brought into intimate relations with President Lincoln. Later, he formed a close friendship with President Garfield, for whom he had a high esteem. During President Cleveland's terms, Dr. Sunderland was the preacher under whom the President sat, and he had the pleasure of officiating at his marriage.

In 1895, at his cordial invitation, Dr. Talmage became co-pastor with him in the church, and three years later Dr. Sunderland, feeling the burden of years, retired from the pastorate, becoming pastor emeritus. When, however, Dr. Talmage resigned shortly afterwards, the church begged its old pastor to resume his work, and he complied. During his ministry, Dr. Sunderland took an active part in the deliberations of the General Assembly on many occasions. He was also a director of Howard University and served on the boards of several hospitals and charitable institutions. Always cheerful, genial and helpful, he delighted to serve in any capacity, and to the last showed little concern for his own ease and quiet, if he could be of service to the Church or the public.

NEW HUSBAND.

Quite an Improvement on the Old

"I have been compelled to stop drinking it. I said to the friend who asked me to stop on up on a cup of her good coffee, she said, 'that needn't bother you, for Postum Food Coffee here, which completely stopped the sick headaches of a friend of mine.' I tried her coffee, and it was good; but when I tried to make it at home, I was disappointed. I soon found out that was not making it correctly, but by putting two heaping teaspoonfuls of Postum Food Coffee and letting it boil twenty minutes was delicious."

I had at that time been an invalid several years, but did not know my illness was caused by coffee drinking, of which I was very fond. I immediately began Postum, and stuck to it. One day a lady who was troubled the same as I, and whose appearance on the street shocked me, for she was so emaciated, exclaimed in surprise at my improved appearance, and wanted to know what I had been doing. She asked me if I had had any of any kind. I said, "Yes, I have Postum Food Coffee to work the almost complete miracle of curing me."

My husband has been absent in Georgia some time, and has been in wretched health having been in the hospital twice for indigestion. I wrote him to stop using coffee, and try Postum, told him also just how to make it. Yesterday I received a letter from him in which he says, "I am feeling very much better, thanks to you and Postum. Sleep better, eat better, and in fact, my condition is quite an improvement on the old husband." Alice L. Gilson, 805 Park Ave., Salt Lake City, Utah.

TRUE PHILANTHROPY*

Love of Men the Natural Expression of the Love of Christ and its Visible Sign and Manifestation

ONE of the most conspicuous and convincing signs of true conversion is the change in the feeling of the converted man towards others. He feels a love for every one, especially for those who love Christ. "We know," John says, "that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Other men may hate their enemies, may be indifferent to the sufferings of their neighbors, but the converted man has a law in him that compels him to a different attitude. Howsoever orthodox a man may be, howsoever regular in attendance on church service and prayer meeting, howsoever liberal in his gifts to Christ's cause, he has reason for concern on self-examination, if he finds himself hating anyone, or remaining indifferent to another's woe. The effect of the change of heart, whenever it occurs, is to bring the subject of it nearer to his fellow-men, to make him more sympathetic and more helpful. Christ knew that it would be so, and his example and his teaching encouraged it. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10) he inculcated the duty in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16) he emphasized the lesson, and in his description of the judgment (Matt. 25) he made the question of beneficence the touchstone of separation between those who were blessed and those who were sent into outer darkness. Looking at these and other utterances of his, we cannot escape the conclusion, that his law for his followers was faith and love, loyalty to himself, manifesting themselves in finding expression in beneficence to people who are in need.

This matter is more important than Christians generally realize. Few ask themselves what their duty toward their neighbors is. Many who give away considerable sums in occasional doles to persistent beggars and to various charities neglect themselves of negligence; but the true philanthropy which Christ looks for, is a very different matter. No man can do his whole duty by a gift of money however large. The fact may be perceived if we put in the place of the recipient of the gift a dearly loved son or brother. If we were dead, and such a relative were in dire need, what kind of help would we like him to get? Perhaps, none is the very worst kind. He may need much more, sympathy, advice, encouragement. The man who of all the needs of the writer's acquaintance, most perfectly fulfills Christ's ideal, is one who has not a hundred dollars of his own in the world, and cannot give money to the needy. Yet he will receive a glorious reward for his helpfulness. He will spend time and take endless trouble to get a boy out of a situation, to find work for a widow, to comfort a mourner, to wait on a poor sick man whose wife must leave him all day to earn bread for the family. He will beg money to set a man up in business; will go to a merchant and deal with him to forgive one of his employees for wrongdoing; will go to court and beg for mercy for a prisoner; will accept a convict when he comes out of the penitentiary and will give him a start in a new life. These things are far more useful than money; but only a man whose heart is full of love for Christ and humanity will do such things. But the time is coming when we shall so clearly appreciate Christ's will that every one who calls himself by Christ's name will feel such things incumbent upon him.

A Committee, who select the topics, on the subject of Foreign Missions, that of philanthropy. Every one who properly appreciates the blessings of the Gospel will recognize the connection. The knowledge of Christ is the greatest need of the world. Most emphatically, he is the prophet described him, "The Desire of all Nations." That he is rejected by many nations, and that there is no appeal from the Gospel from any does not destroy his title. If they knew the blessings ready to impart, they would desire him. If they understood what submission to him and the acceptance of his rule would bring, they would long for him beyond any other blessing. Even among ourselves, men are blind to the beauty of his character. So, the truest philanthropy, is to make him known to all who know him not. No service that we can render to a brother, either at our own doors or in some heathen land, can benefit him so much as the service of leading him to Christ. We need to feel that the true motive of such work is not apprehension of what will happen to the man who dies in heathenism, but the fact that he is missing the highest good possible to a human being. If we realized fully what Christ is to us, the message would burn within us like a fire until it was delivered. There would be no lack of funds in the treasuries of the missionary societies. The millions who cannot go to preach to the heathen would be so eager for them to have the Gospel, that they would gladly provide all the money that is needed. Christ expected so much of his people. In some way, by some means, every one whom he saves is bound to help others. That is what he is saved for. The Christian who gives to the missionary society becomes a partner in the work of the missionary, and his self-denial that he may give more is an expression of the love of Christ in his own chosen way of giving to humanity for his sake.

CALLED BY THE LORD

Abraham Summoned from Home and Kindred to be a Witness for God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

GOD never leaves himself without witness. Noah lived until nearly the time of Abram's birth, and Shem lived nearly till the time of Abram's death. The flood could not have become a forgotten story of the past while men yet lived who had been in the ark. And yet idolatry must have been early practised after the flood; and "the family of Abram" dwelt of old time beyond the river [Euphrates], even Terah, the father of Abraham and the father of Nahor; and they served other gods (Josh. 24: 2). The testimony of Noah had ceased with his death; as far as we know, there was no man now living who walked with God; there was nothing to be hoped for from man as a race. But God chose from the idolatrous family of Terah, one man who could respond to him, and whom he would make to be a witness, for him to all generations. In Heb. 11: 8, we read that God called Abraham, and in Acts 7: 2, Stephen tells how this call came to him. The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran. And Abraham recognized the authority of the call, and obeyed.

Abraham was called, not for himself alone. "Now the Lord said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will show thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great: and be thou a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and him that curseth thee will I curse; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. 12: 1-3, R. V.). It was a tremendous announcement for one who only now began to know the living God, that such a prospect lay before him; and when, how, by what means, these three great promises should be fulfilled, was not told him. He must take the promises, as they were, upon trust. Either God was not true, and all was an imagination, or God was true, and fully able to do all he said. Then such a prospect was worth all it should cost. Country must go; where he was now known, respected, honored, he would be a forgotten stranger. Kindred must go! In the East, family ties are so strong, that generations of one family live together in the same village, often in the same enclosure. What! no home life? Must I leave my nearest and dearest? Must I leave those who will suffer for the want of me? My father's house? How can anyone respect my religion if I seem to neglect my parents? It meant much to this man. He must be very sure in his God.

How long the struggle may have lasted we know not. This we know: "By faith, Abraham, when he was called, obeyed, to go out unto a place which he was to receive for an inheritance, and he went out, not knowing whither he went." This was faith. He began his life in God by taking for granted that God was right in everything, and he acted accordingly. There was no question as to whether it suited him, what he should gain by it, what people would say of him, what it should cost him. All this he left to God. God, because he was God, had a right to ask anything of him. God, because he was God, could never deceive him; therefore, he obeyed and trusted. Are we children of Abraham? "They which be of faith, the same are sons of Abraham" (Gal. 3: 7, R. V.).

Abraham believed and obeyed, and God chose in him the whole nation of Israel to be to him "for a people and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory" (Jer. 13: 11), and although the people of Israel, as a people, have never yet perceived and risen to the greatness of their calling, there lies before them a future of blessing as a nation and of blessing to the nations in the coming millennium, which is the great theme of the prophecies of the Old Testament.

"Abram went as the Lord had spoken to him." He left his country and his kindred, but some of his father's house went with him; Terah and Lot, as well as Sarai his wife. Here was a complication and a compromise. How often consideration for those in our own family has led us to stop short of something which the Lord has shown us! God called Abraham to go into the land of Canaan, but until the death of Terah he got only half way, to Haran. Probably there was no small conflict in his mind between the call of God, and what to do with his father, who not only did not hinder him from leaving his country, but even went out with him, and who yet was the one obstacle to his fully obeying the Lord. Oh, the perplexities and tangles in the family life of every child of God, the conflicting duties, as it seems, when nothing can be done but to wait and trust! How wonderfully often God delivers in a most unexpected way! The death of Terah set Abram free. But it is a question whether, had he trusted God more fully, he might not have gone at once into the promised land. "So Abram went as the Lord had spoken unto him," seems to imply that during Terah's life his obedience had not been perfect.

Lot, his nephew, was still with him. Abram had gone out in obedience to a distinct revelation from heaven. Lot had some religion; he is called righteous Lot (II. Peter 2: 7), and yet his faith seems to have been somewhat secondhand, and his departure out of Mesopotamia to have been rather a following of Abram than a following of God. Let us take care that our life in God is not a secondhand matter, and that our steps are not guided by what we see in others, but by the Word of God speaking to our own souls. When temptation came, Lot was not proof against it.

ACTIVE BRAINS.

Must Have Good Food or Nervous
Prostration Surely Follows.

It is a lamentable fact that American brain workers do not, as a rule, know how to feed themselves to rebuild the daily loss occasioned by active mental effort. This fact, coupled with the disastrous effects of the alkaloids contained in tobacco, coffee and whiskey, makes a sure pathway towards nervous prostration.

The remedy is simple enough. Employ the services of a food expert, who knows the kind of food required to rebuild the daily losses in the human body. This can be done by making free use of Grape-Nuts, the famous breakfast food, which contains exactly the elemental principles which have an affinity for albumen and go directly to rebuild the gray matter in the brain, solar plexus and nerve centers throughout the body. Follow your selection of food up with a dismissal of coffee, tobacco and whiskey for fifteen days and mark the difference in your mental ability, which means everything to the average hustling American, who must have physical and mental strength, or he falls out in the race for dollars.

of the most famous railroad train in the world are on sale in every city, town, village and hamlet in the United States.

The picture is the New York Central's Empire State Express, and was made from a photograph by A. P. Yates, of Syracuse, taken when the train was running 64 miles an hour.

The photograph is a marvel of photography and the engraving is a marvel of the engraver's art. It is predicted that one of these engravings will find a place in every household in America, as well as in thousands of those in Europe.

For a photographure etching of this train, 20 x 24 inches, printed on photo paper, suitable for framing, send fifty cents in currency, stamps, express or postal money order to George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, Grand Central Station, New York.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Aug. 21

1. How can a pastor carry out effectively the Scriptural injunction, "Go out and compel them to come in"?
2. Is a lady of the house justified in telling her servant to say to callers, whom she does not wish to see, "She is not at home," when she is?
3. What was the "Book without words," and where and when was it published?
4. Is a pastor, who has no special need of a rest during the summer, justified in going off for two or three months, just because he enjoys the change, and leaving his flock shepherdless?
5. Was the miracle at Pentecost (Acts 2: 5-13) wrought on the preachers or the hearers?

Questions of the Week

1. What is the total population of the world, from the Creation (assuming it to be a period of 5,900 years) until the present time?

Any estimate must be a mere approximation. Let us assume sixty centuries, in round numbers, since the creation of man, and allow three generations to a century. This gives 180 generations, and allowing a billion persons to each, we have one hundred and eighty billion (180,000,000,000) persons. This is probably an over-liberal estimate, since at the beginning there was only one pair, and after the flood only eight persons on the earth. It is sometimes asked, "Would there be room for them on the earth if the billions of the dead were resurrected?" Any one taking the trouble to calculate will find that Texas, as a cemetery, with its more than six trillion square feet, would furnish more than thirty square feet to each dead body of the above number. The present population of the earth could find standing room in London or in Philadelphia.

AMELIA HOYT.

Population has shown the capability, over a vast territory on more than one continent and through considerable periods of time, of doubling once in twenty-five years. With this capability we may say, that if "neither evil nor the fear of evil" checked the population of the United States, it would in a little over a century amount to three thousand millions. But as a matter of fact, the increase in the population of the world, owing to those causes enunciated in the doctrine of Malthusianism, has not followed the law of geometrical progression. Nor yet does it follow the law of arithmetical progression. For at the death of the Emperor Augustus, the population of the world was estimated by Bodio at only fifty-four millions; while since that time it has increased to fifteen hundred millions. History does not furnish us with reliable statistics since census-taking has only been scientifically practised during the last century. It is evident, therefore, that any attempt at a solution of the problem will be altogether inexact. Assuming, however, that the average population of the two hundred generations since the Creation is one-quarter the present population of the world, the total would be fifty times the present population—or 75,000,000,000.

FRED. L. SAWYER.

2. Should a pastor be the superintendent of his own Sunday School?

No, for various reasons. 1. He has work enough. Sermons to prepare and preach, prayer meetings to attend, with other regular and extra calls, render it inadvisable for him to superintend a Sunday School. 2. He must have time for general reading. Church papers, newspapers, magazines, new books and other literature must not be neglected by the winning pastor. 3. Some layman would be deprived of a good office. Certainly there are very few Church societies without some intelligent, consecrated layman for this work. 4. Pastoral work lays claim to his time, a work of vital importance. 5. It would leave too little for the laity. More of our members should be enlisted in Church work. 6. It would create too great dependence on the ministry. In isolated places, where there could be no Sunday School unless superintended by the pastor, till some one could be found, or grown, it might be allowable. Even then the pastor should surrender the office at the earliest practicable moment. 7. Finally, this important office should have all the time and thought of one good man. This the pastor cannot give. The successful superintendent must give the work his undivided attentions. He should, therefore, be a layman.

CHAS. LYNCH.

Yes, by all means. It is the best way. It creates a favorable impression on the minds of his Sunday School that he is their friend and pastor, and takes a personal interest in them. It prevents a superintendent from assuming too much, and asserting rights that do not belong to him. In such a school it is very often the case for superintendents to make addresses. Such are sometimes filled with mistaken ideas, to say nothing of heretical assertions. I have heard of leaders making speeches before schools in which heresy was stated, of course, mistakenly. The pastor should spend much time in coming in close contact with the children. By his ministerial mien he can make good impressions on the young, impossible in a leader.

A. DE R. MEARES.

3. Is it a lie to tell a very sick person that a friend "is well," when, in fact, he is dead, but you think the sick person will not bear up under the sad news?

If the friend was a Christian, what should he be but "well," in every sense of the word; well, with the bloom of immortal health; well, with eternal happiness. If, however, the reverse is believed, an answer can be truthfully returned, that we do not know. Sometimes absolute truth, cheerfully and pleasantly told, is more likely to satisfy a sick person than evasions, as he is likely to suspect that you are trying to deceive him, and the uncertainty is very trying. We cannot think that a falsehood is ever right.

H. V. C.

A lie cannot be justified under any circumstance. There is no such thing as a white lie. A black object may be whitewashed, but under the white the black still remains. To tell a very sick person that a friend is well when he is dead, is to practice deception to cover a truth, and sacrifice conscience on the altar of feeling. But there is a sweet, tender way of breaking sad news to sorrowful friends. Prepare the heart for its burden, then tenderly put the load upon it. But between the heart and its burden place a prayer. It will lighten the burden and strengthen the heart. Perhaps another way out of the difficulty would be to consult the patient's doctor, and ask his advice. Perhaps, it would be well in some cases, where such news would be fatal, to withhold it, at least as long as possible, or until a convenient moment when the patient possibly is stronger.

R. T. EDWARDS.

4. What rule should guide in deciding what is a just compensation for another's labor, instead of his dire necessity?

The Golden Rule—do unto others as you would they should do unto you. If that were the universal practice between capital and labor, and mistresses and servants, contention, hatred and mistrust would cease, and justice and equity be the practice, and not the exception, among all classes. If one were to be given only enough for his dire necessity, it would be insufficient as a matter of justice. The day will come when the laborer will be too old and infirm to work longer for his employer, and having been discharged because incapacitated, what is he to live on? Shall he be allowed to starve? Is that justice to our fellowman?

A. DE R. MEARES.

The only practical rule is the current market value as fixed by the law of supply and demand. If the market is overstocked with labor of a certain class, there is neither sense nor justice in giving, in one exceptional case, a rate which would be out of all proportion to the market rate. We must regard the market rate as standing between the two extremes of a "dire necessity" figure and a sentimental or "fancy" value. The Golden Rule ought to govern in all things, but some unwise ones interpret it to mean that the employer should give wholly regardless of rule, golden or otherwise.

MARIA AYLMEYER.

5. When Paul wrote (Romans 13: 1-7) that he who resisted the powers that be received to himself damnation, did he really mean to condemn revolution in every age—our own revolutionary war, for instance?

MARIA AYLMEYER.

I have always understood this passage of Scripture to mean, that to resist the powers that be, brings upon him that resists the natural punishment of the law. I don't think it can mean spiritual damnation. If that were true and had been obeyed, would the world have advanced or made progress since Christ's time? Yet, I often wonder, if evil had been overcome with good, if when one cheek had been smitten the other had been offered, if when the coat had been taken the cloak had been given also, we would not have been far in advance of where we now are? Nations have not yet arrived at the point of treating with each other on this principle. Will they ever?

MRS. M. E. CRAVATH.

In the passage quoted, as in the one on marriage, Paul speaks out of a mind permeated with his great mission. Everything was to be subordinated to spiritual interest. Let the Christian living under Roman law, submit to the law. God permitted the empire to exist, and had appointed it to a definite purpose of maintaining order and punishing evil-doers, let the Christian obey the law and he would be let alone to seek his own spiritual advancement. To mix himself up with fruitless seditious plots to overthrow the Government, would be suicidal folly. If the Government should be overthrown, and another substituted, the Christian should submit to that. These matters were beneath his concern. His life was hid with Christ in God. In any case, existing institutions were only temporary; very soon Christ would come and inaugurate his kingdom. Until then let the Christian set an example of good behavior, and especially give no occasion to the Roman authorities to accuse him of evil-doing. I think that is the meaning of the passage. The man who insisted on his rights as a Roman citizen, and would not submit to injustice (Acts 16: 35-39; 22: 24-29), would have been the last man to condemn Cromwell or Washington.

Miscellaneous Questions

B. A. T. Some of my neighbors contend that it is contrary to the Bible to buy and sell dogs. Is there any law prohibiting the purchase or sale of a dog?

Possibly the passage to which they refer is Deut. 23: 18. This forbids the offering in the temple of the price of a dog, that animal being classed with other "abomination" yond this, the Bible contains nothing subject.

Reader, Moorhead, Ia. Should a Christian one who is not a Christian if it is very that that one will become a Christian?

Maj. John B. Ketchum, of the U. S. Army, Christian Aid Association, 42nd way, New York, writes us that there are posts in Nebraska, viz.: Fort Robinson, Niobrara and Fort Crook, and there one chaplain, Rev. B. Kelly, at Fort C.

Mother, Plainfield, N. J. I have a number of questions which my children have outgrown. You make them of use in your Fresh A.

Indeed we can. The children who Mont-Lawn are very needy. One of features of our work is sending our children back clad in good, strong clothing their poverty-stricken tenement mothers. Our children are from four to twelve years old, and anything in the way of wearing apparel, blouses, trousers, jackets, dresses, undersleeves, hats and shoes, are ingly acceptable. The gratitude of a little ragged folks should carry a blessing every kindly hand which helps us to them. Clothing should be expressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Mrs. —, Sharon, O. The first is a case for the local or State Excise Commissioners; the second, for the Board of Health. They will act on the matter being properly brought to their attention.

Mrs. W. K., Penrith, Man. Certainly it would be Sabbath desecration. But altogether apart from the Sunday aspect of the question, such amusements are inconsistent with the Christian profession.

Mrs. T. W. M., Williamsport, Pa. Such a condition would be ridiculous, if not indeed monstrous. It would be imposing terms on the mighty. The reasonable supposition is expression was merely one of grateful acknowledgment.

Mrs. —, Coeymans, N. Y. The minister has no authority to take such a step. He can bring the matter up regularly before the church, which can take the necessary action, or he can induce the member to solve the difficulty by voluntary resignation.

Milo B., Alma City, Minn. The customization of the pronouns representing has in late years been discontinued by many editions. In the Revised Bible, both American and English editions follow the new method, the old way was more expressive of reverence.

WAITING FOR BOOKS IN THE CIRCULATING LIBRARY

EDUCATIONAL ALLIANCE BUILDING

THE READING-ROOM CROWD OF KNOWLEDGE SEEKERS

Americanizing Our Alien Hosts

At the corner of East Broadway and Jefferson streets, New York, and in the heart of a populous Ghetto, stands a tall and handsome building, covering the better part of a square. Over the doorway you read: "Educational Alliance," and you think at once of lectures, classes, libraries, and literature in general. On the corner of the building a large poster bears in big lettering—English and Yiddish below: "The roof-garden open for children in the morning and afternoon, and acts from 7 to 11 in the evening. Old or sick people, and mothers with babies, admitted at all hours, which the roof-garden is open. Only children accompanying their parents are admitted in the evening. Only women with babies, and sick persons, will be taken up on the elevator." The contrast between the severe legend over the door and the roof-garden poster, you gain some idea of the broadly broad interpretation of the word "educational" as found in the former; the latter meant to cover the wide range of processes by which the intellectual, social, ethical, physical and spiritual natures are developed; the institution—by whatever name it may go—is doing the work of a mammoth social settlement in the biggest Hebrew social club in the United States—perhaps in the world. Said Hon. Charles S. Hewitt before the last meeting of the members of the Alliance: "There are in New York two institutions devoted to uplifting of the masses. They are the Cooper Union and the Educational Alliance;" and he spoke of the latter as the "Nursery of the Cooper Union."

This institution was founded and is sustained by Hebrews. Isidor Straus is President of the Board of Directors, and such names as Jacob Schiff's, Isaac Guggenheim's, and others equally identified with metropolitan progress and philanthropy, appear on its record of history and management. Its benefits are irrespective of race or creed, and hundreds of people of all beliefs avail themselves of advantages offered. Christian as well as Hebrew teachers are on the roll of instructors, and Christian workers in downtown settlements and missions find its privileges helpful. Standing as the centre of a Jewish community, the great mass of its beneficiaries are naturally Hebrews. The erection of the building was one of the many needed benevolences following the great influx (beginning in 1881) of Jews from Russia and Roumania, and the value to our city and nation of this work in Americanizing the army of foreigners seeking our shores is beyond calculation. Children just landed and knowing no word of English are received into the English Classes for Immigrants; and from these promoted, as progress permits, into the public schools. To the adult foreigner, ignorant of our tongue, these classes are a great benefaction. They are supported by the Baron de Hirsch Fund. Other departments carried on in summer are: sewing classes, typewriting, stenography; outdoor and indoor athletics; roof-garden and auditorium entertainments; outings of children to city parks; special club meetings and outings; Recreation Camp at Huntington, L. I., Aguilar Free Library and Reading Room and city vacation schools. Gymnasium, Baths and Social Rooms are open. The year's list of regular activities include drawing, music, literature, basket-work, cooking, millinery, etc.

In and out of this great building, from 5,000 to 6,000 people pass daily. During the "hot week," 3,000 to 4,000 children crowded the roof-garden daily, and over 1,600 spent their evenings there. To people of the neighborhood, whose squalid cramped abodes give them no breathing space, that roof-garden is a godsend. Tired mothers, sick babies and weary laboring men may all be found taking their ease there every night until eleven, the hour of closing. Visit the garden in the day, and you are astonished to find how many things can go on at the same time on a roof. There are sand-piles in one corner for the tiniest ones; here, boys run races; there, they play checkers; on this bench sits a quiet group studying picture books; on that, a small company assembles to lunch; in the shadow of the awning and hard by the hedge of green plants, little folks are swinging, while on another is a kindergarten in full session.

POLISHED CRIME

TEXT—Daniel 4: 33:

THE SAME HOUR WAS THE THING FULFILLED UPON NEBUCHADNEZZAR; AND HE WAS DRIVEN FROM MEN, AND DID EAT GRASS AS OXEN.

HERE is the mightiest of the Babylonish kings. Look at him. He did more for the grandeur of the capital than did all his predecessors or successors. Hanging gardens, reservoirs, aqueducts, palaces, all of his own planning. The bricks that are brought up to-day from the ruins of Babylon have his name on them, "Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, King of Babylon." He was a great conqueror. He stretched forth his spear toward a nation, and it surrendered. But he plundered the temple of the true God. He lifted an idol, Bel Merodach, and compelled the people to bow down before it, and if they refused they must go through the red-hot furnace, or be crunched by lion or lioness. So God pulled him down.

He was smitten with what physicians call lycanthropy, and fancied that he was a wild beast, and he went out and pastured amid the cattle. God did not excuse him because he had committed the sin in high places, or because the transgression was wide resounding. He measured Nebuchadnezzar in high place just as he would measure the humblest captive.

But in our time, you know as well as I, that there is a disposition to put a halo around iniquity if it is committed in conspicuous place, and if it is wide resounding and of large proportions. Ever and anon there has been an epidemic of crime in high places, and there is not a State or a city, and hardly a village which has not been called to look upon astounding forgery, or an absconding bank cashier or president, or the wasting of trust-fund or swindling mortgages. I propose, in carrying out the suggestion of my text, as far as I can, to scatter the fascinations around iniquity, and show you that sin is sin and wrong is wrong, whether in high place or low place, and that it will be dealt with by that God who dealt with impalated Nebuchadnezzar.

The Pulpit's Twofold Message

All who preach feel that two kinds of sermons are necessary: the one on the faith of the Gospel, the other on the morality of the Gospel—and the one is just as important as the other, for you know that in this land to-day there are hundreds of men hiding behind the communion tables and in churches of Jesus Christ who have no business to be there as professors of religion. They expect to be all right with God, although they are all wrong with man. And while I want you to understand that by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified, and a mere honest life cannot enter us into Heaven, I want you as plainly to understand that unless the life is right the heart is not right. Grace in the heart and grace in the life; so we must preach sometimes the faith of the Gospel and sometimes the morality of the Gospel.

It seems to me there has not been a time in the last fifty years when this latter truth needed more thoroughly to be presented in the American churches. It needs to be presented to-day.

Look upon all the fascinations thrown around fraud in this country. You know for years men have been made heroes of, and pictorialized, and in various ways presented to the public, as though sometimes they were worthy of admiration, if they have scattered the funds of banks, or swallowed great estates that did not belong to them. Our young men have been dazed with this quick accumulation. They have said: "That's the way to do it. What's the use of our plodding on with small wages or insignificant salary, when we may go into business life, and with some stratagem achieve such a fortune as that man has achieved?" A different measure has been applied to the crime of Wall Street from that which has been applied to the spoils which the man carries up Rat Alley.

There has been an irresistible impression going abroad among young men that the poorest way to get money is to earn it. The young man of flaunting cravat says to the young man of humble apparel, "What, you only get $1,800 a year? Why, that wouldn't keep me in pin-money. I spend $5,000 a year." "Where do you get it," asks the plain young man. "Oh, stocks, enterprises, all that sort of thing, you know." The plain young man has hardly enough money to pay his board, has to wear clothes after they are out of fashion, and deny himself all luxuries. After a while he gets tired of his plodding, and he goes to the man who has achieved suddenly large estate, and he says, "Just show me how it is done." And he is shown. He soon learns how, and although he is almost all the time idle now, and has resigned his position in the bank, or the factory, or the store, he has more money than he ever had, trades off his old silver watch for a gold one with a flashing chain, sets his hat a little further over on the side of his head than he ever did, smokes better cigars, and more of them. He has his hand in! Now, if he can escape the penitentiary for three or four years he will get into political circles, and he will get political jobs, and will have something to do with harbors, and pavements, and docks. Now he has got so far along he is safe for perdition.

Now I always thank God when I find an estate like that go to smash. It is plague-struck, and it blasts the nation. I thank God when it goes into such a wreck it can never be gathered up again. I want it to become so loathsome and such an insufferable stench that honest young men will take warning.

The Courage of Principle

How many dishonesties in the making out of invoices, and in the plastering of false labels, and in the filching of customers of rival houses, and in the making and breaking of contracts. Young men are indoctrinated in the idea that the sooner they get money the better, and the getting of it on a larger scale only proves to them their greater ingenuity. There is a glitter thrown around about all these things. Young men have got to find out that God looks upon sin in a very different light. Let me say to you, my young friend, that you can be a great deal happier in poverty, than you ever can be happy in a prosperity which comes from ill-gotten gains. "Oh," you say, "I might lose my place. It is easy for you to stand there and talk, but it is no easy thing to get a place when you have lost it. Beside that, I have a widowed mother depending upon my exertions, and you must not be too reckless in giving advice to me." Ah, my young friend, it is always safe to do right, but it is never safe to do wrong. You go home and tell your mother the pressure under which you are in that store, and I know what she will say to you if she is worthy of you. She will say: "My son, come out from there; God has taken care of us all these years, and he will take care of us now; come out of that."

Oh, there is such a fearful fascination in this day about the use of trust-funds. It has got to be popular to take the funds of others and speculate with them. There are many who are practising that iniquity. Almost every man in the course of his life has the property of others put in his care. He has administered, perhaps, for a dead friend; he is an attorney, and money passes from debtor to creditor through his hands; or he is in a commercial establishment, and gets a salary for the discharge of his responsibilities; or he is treasurer of a philanthropic institution, and money for the suffering goes through his hands; or he has some office in city, or State, or nation, and taxes, and subsidies, and supplies, and salaries are in his hands. Now, that is a trust. That is as sacred a trust as God can give a man. It is the concentration of confidence. Now, when that man takes that money—the money of others—and goes to speculating with it for his own purposes, he is guilty of theft, falsehood and perjury, and in the most intense sense of the word is a miscreant.

There are families to-day—widows and orphans—with nothing between them and starvation but a sewing machine, or kept out of the vortex by the thread of a needle red with the blood of their hearts, who were by father or husband left a competency. You read the story in the newspaper of those who have lost by a bank defalcation, and it is only one line, the name of a woman you never heard of, and just one or two figures telling the amount of stock she had, the number of shares. It is a very short line in a newspaper, but it is a line of agony long as time; it is a story long as eternity.

Oh, that God would scatter these fascinations about fraud, and let us all understand that if I steal from you one dollar I am a thief, and if I steal from you $500,000 I am five hundred thousand times more of a thief!

Aristocratic Libertinism

So there has been a great deal of fascination thrown around libertinism. Society is very severe upon the impurity that lurks around the alleys and low haunts of the town. The law pursues it, smites it, incarcerates it, tries to destroy it. You know as well as I that society becomes lenient in proportion as impurity becomes affluent or is in elevated circles, and finally society is silent, or disposed to palliate. Where is the judge, the jury, the police officer that dare arraign the wealthy libertine? He walks the streets, he rides the parks, he flaunts his iniquity in the eyes of the pure. The hag of uncleanness looks out of the tapestried window. Where is the law that dares take the brazen wretches and put their faces in an iron frame of a State prison window?

Sometimes it seems to me as if society were going back to the state of morals of Herculaneum, when it sculptured its villainous on pillars and temple wall, and nothing but the lava of a burning mountain could hide the immensity of crime. At what time God will rise up and extirpate these evils upon society I know not, nor whether he will do it by fire, or hurricane, or earthquake; but a Holy God I do not think will much longer. I believe the thunderbolts are hot, and that when God comes to chastise the nation for these sins, against which he has uttered more bitterly than against any other, the fate of and Gomorrah will be tolerable as compared with the fate of our society, which knew better, but did not.

Then look at the fascinations thrown around nation. There are in all communities men who taken the lives of others unlawfully, not as executors of the law, and they go scot free. You say their provocations. God gave life and he also gave the right to take it, and he may take it by visitation of Providence, or by an executioner of the law, or by a messenger. But when a man assumes the prerogative he touches the lowest depth of crime.

Unpunished Assassination

Society is alert for certain kinds of murder. A citizen going along the road at night is waylaid and slain by a robber we all want the villain arrested and executed. For all garroting, for all beating out of a club, or an ax, or a slungshot, the law is swift and heavy stroke; but you know that when a man gets affluent and high position, and they aver wrongs by taking the lives of others, great sympathy is excited: lawyers plead, ladies weep, judge hails the man as a hero, and the man goes free. If the verdict is to be against him a new trial is called on through technicality, and they adjourn for witnesses to come, and adjourn and adjourn until the case has forgotten all about it, and then the prisoner opens and the murderer goes free.

Now, if capital punishment be right, I say let the life of the polished murderer go with the life of the vulgar assassin. Let us have no partiality of gallows, aristocracy of electrocution chair. Do not let us go back to barbarism, when every man was his own judge, jury, and executioner, and that man had the sword who had the sharpest knife, and the strongest arm, the quickest step, and the stealthiest revenge. He wilfully and in hatred takes the life of another, I care not what the provocation or the circumstances. He may be cleared by an entire court-room, he may be sent to some foreign land, modern literature may polish the crime until it looks like heroism; but in the sight of God murder is murder, and the judgment day will so reveal it.

Now, do not be fascinated by the glamor of the crime of whatever sort. Because others have had it, that seem brilliant, but yet at the same time are dark, do not choose such faults. Stand independent of such influences. Put your confidence in the Lord. He will be your strength. "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

Drifting to Destruction

As I stand in pulpits looking over audiences, sometimes my heart fails me. There are so many present, so many who have sacrificed their integrity, many far away from God. Why, my brothers, have been too many prayers offered for you to go overboard. And there are those venturing into sin, and my heart aches to call them back.

At Brighton Beach or Long Branch you hear men go down into the surf to bathe, and they come out further and further, and you get anxious about them. You said, "I wonder if they can swim?" and then stood and shouted, "Come back! come back! they will be drowned!" They waved their hand back, saying, "No danger." They kept on wading deeper and deeper out from shore, until after awhile a great wave with a strong undertow took them out, their cries the next day washed on the beach. So I see men adding down into sin further and further, and I call them back. "Come back! come back! You will be lost! you will be lost!" They wave their hand back, saying, "No danger, no danger." Deeper down and deeper down after awhile a wave sweeps them out and sweeps off forever. Oh, come back!

"Oh," you say, "you don't know where I came from, you don't know what my history has been; you know what iniquity I have plotted; I have gone through the whole catalogue of sin." My brother, I know the story, but I tell you this: the door of mercy is wide open. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Though you had been polluted with the worst of crimes, though you have been smitten with the worst of leprosy, though you have been filled with all evil passions, this moment on your brow, in your iniquitous indulgences, may be set the flashing of a Saviour's forgiveness.

Baptist Young People in Conference

TEN YEARS OF STUDY AND ACTIVE SERVICE TO BE CELEBRATED IN CHICAGO THIS WEEK

ONE more great convention of young people is preparing. The Christian Endeavorers have celebrated, the Epworth Leaguers met last week, and now this week the Baptist Young People's Union has its field days. The meetings will begin July 25, and will close on July 28. They will be in Chicago, chiefly in the Coliseum. That there will be a large number in attendance there is no doubt. The enthusiasm of the demonstration will insure that result. A preliminary meeting will be held on the evening of July 24, at which there will be a general review of the work of the Union during the past ten years. The work in the South will be reviewed by Dr. J. B. Cranfill, of Dallas, Tex.; in the North by a leader not yet finally selected, but probably Dr. E. E. Chivers, of Boston, who knows most about it; and that in England, by Thomas Urquhart, of Toronto. The regular sessions of the Convention begin with three Prayer Meetings at as many churches on Thursday morning. At 9.30, there will be a Praise Service, lasting about half an hour, in the Coliseum, led by a specially trained choir; following which the addresses of welcome on behalf of the citizens, the young people and the churches of Chicago, will be delivered, and the Board of Managers will present its report. In the afternoon, the "courses," which are the distinctive feature of the Union, will be reviewed. The Bible Readers will be conducted by Rev. Howard Wayne Smith, of Baltimore; the Sacred Literature Course, by Rev. F. P. Leach, of Sioux Falls, S. D.; and the Conquest Missionary Course, by Dr. C. A. Hobbs, of Delevan, Wis. Addresses on the Prayer Meeting, by Dr. J. W. Weddell, of Davenport, Ia.; and on Social Life, by Rev. W. R. Wood, of Ottawa, Kan., will follow. In the evening, the Senior Bible Readers and the Conquest Missionary Banners for the year will be presented. President John H. Chapman will deliver his address, and Dr. J. B. Gambrell, of Dallas, Tex., will speak on "The Way to the Throne."

On Friday, after the usual morning Prayer Meetings, there will be a business meeting for the election of officers, and the decision of matters to be submitted by the Committee. Prof. C. L. Williams, of Granville, Ohio, will speak on "The Kingship of Christ in the Intellectual Realm," and Dr. W. Weeks, of Toronto, on "The Kingship of Christ in the Spiritual Realm." In the afternoon there will be an Open Parliament on "The Lessons of the Past Ten Years." In the evening, after the preliminary Praise Service, the presentation of the Senior Sacred Literature and General Merit Banners will take place. This will be followed by addresses on "The Army of the King," by Rev. C. S. Gardner of Greenville, S. C., and on "The Foes of the King," by Dr. H. C. Applegarth, of Cambridge, Mass.

Saturday morning's session, after the usual early morning Prayer Meeting, will be occupied by three half-hour addresses on "The Subjects of the King." Rev. W. J. Williamson, of Kansas City, Mo., will speak of the "Subjects in Recreation"; Isaac W. Carpenter, of Omaha, Neb., will speak of them "In Business"; and Rev. G. L. Morrill, of Minneapolis, Minn., of them "In the State." In the afternoon the Juniors will have their exercises, and addresses will be given on "Preparation for the Service of the King." The evening session is to be Imperialistic under the title of "The Enlargement of the Kingdom." There will be three addresses under this head: Principal A. P. McDiarmid, of Brandon, Manitoba, on "Taking North America"; Dr. R. J. Willingham, of Richmond, Va., on "The Outreaching of the Homeland"; and Rev. F. P. Haggard, who has been laboring as a missionary in Assam, will deliver "A Message From the Front."

On Sunday morning there will be a Prayer and Praise Service from nine o'clock to half-past ten in the Coliseum. Many of the assembled pastors will occupy the pulpits of Chicago and will preach from the text, "Thy kingdom come," with special reference to the importance and value of the work for and by young people. In the afternoon there will be a half-hour service of song, and then the Convention sermon will be preached by Dr. E. E. Chivers, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who has been a most devoted worker in the service of the Union, and has done much to mould its activities into their present shape. The evening session, which will close the Convention, will be occupied by three addresses. Rev. L. W. Terry, of Denver, Colo., will speak on the work accomplished by the Union; Dr. J. B. Cranfill, of Dallas, Tex., will speak on Consecration, and Rev. W. H. Geistweit will deliver the Consecration Address.

As will be seen from this outline of the exercises, the Key-word of the Convention is Kingship. There is no doctrine more important in its influence on Christ's people, and it is well that in these days the Union emphasizes it. The idea of loyalty and obedience once thoroughly fixed in the Christian's mind, keeps him strong in the hour of temptation and reproves inconsistencies of life. One of our novelists represents one of his characters who, though a deacon in the Church, was guilty of unrighteous and uncharitable conduct in his business, as complaining of his minister for "preaching mere morality." He said he wanted to hear from that pulpit more about his Redeemer, and the great doctrine of imputed righteousness.

There are many people of his mind, and they enjoy best those sermons in which the preacher does not insist on the duties of the Christian life.

As our readers are aware, the Union is in some measure an outgrowth of Christian Endeavor; but long before the latter movement began the Baptist Churches had, here and there, experimented along that line. From the able review of the history of the movement prepared by Dr. E. E. Chivers for the Baptist Union, we learn that as far back as 1848 a society of young people had been organized in the First Baptist Church of Rochester, N. Y. Other churches had their societies also, and the benefits derived from them were demonstrated. But no step was taken toward the association of the societies on a State or national basis, until the Christian Endeavor movement had proved the benefit of such a combination. In many Baptist Churches, Christian Endeavor Societies were organized, and for a time the hope was cherished that both the Baptists and the Methodists would be content to remain in fellowship with the general body. But denominational bonds were too strong. The leaders of the two churches seem to have been fearful that in associating with other Christian people the young folks might lose sight of the distinctive principles for which the churches stood.

Rev. O. W. Van Osdel, of Ottawa, Kan., was the pioneer of separation. He designed a plan for a distinct organization, with the motto, "Loyalty to Christ in all things at all times." The plan was widely circulated, and gave rise to the movement which came to be known as the Loyalist Movement. It was endorsed by the Baptist Ministers of Kansas at their meeting at Fort Scott in 1888, and a programme was prepared for an inaugural meeting for the following year. No formal organization was, however, effected; but at the meetings of the Baptists of Nebraska in the same year, the project took definite shape in a proposal that young people's societies in the Baptist churches of that State should unite in denominational affiliation, no matter what name they bore. Wisconsin and other States followed the example thus set, and in the following year the project was brought formally before the Baptist ministers at their convention in Chicago. A committee was appointed, consisting of two members from every State represented to carry it out.

A preliminary meeting was held in Philadelphia in April, 1891, at which a suggested constitution for a national organization was drafted, and on July 7 representatives of all the States in which a State Union had been organized, assembled in Chicago to organize a national union.

Representatives of thirty-three States and two Canadian Provinces convened and the project was fairly launched. Mr. John H. Chapman was elected President, Dr. R. F. Y. Pierce, Secretary, and Mr. J. O. Staples, Treasurer.

So rapidly did the movement spread that in 1893 the number of Societies had grown to five thousand, and they were found in all the States and Territories, and in all the Provinces of Canada. The number now existing will be disclosed at the Convention this week, and will doubtless show a large increase.

Legation Children in Washington

LIFE IN THE HOMES OF FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVES

Of all the children of people in high places in Washington, the children of the diplomats are considered as having the highest standing socially. At least this would be so, if the little ones were to follow the rule and laws of social precedence laid down for their parents in Washington. As all social progress, even of Americans in Washington, is by introduction through the diplomatic set, the children of the diplomats may be said to be little aristocrats holding juvenile precedence over children of Senators and Representatives in baby society. They are ranked only by the children of Cabinet Ministers. The children of the Justices of the Supreme Court are their equals in rank, so far as rank may be considered as a feature of Washington life.

The noon hour, as in other cities in the North and Middle East, is the hour for these children's outing. They play in the circles and parks, in which Washington abounds; roller-skate over the asphalt streets, go for rides in automobiles, and learn to speak French and English, as well as their native language, as soon as they begin to utter words. Indoors, they are little potentates—in this respect not unlike the children of many folks who are not of the diplomatic circle.

It is not a very easy thing to secure photographs of Washington's foreign babies, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is fortunate in being able to reproduce a number of snap-shots of these exalted little personages, taken specially for this paper, besides the photographs of three proud mothers with their little ones. These ladies of the diplomatic corps are Countess Quadt, wife of the First Secretary of the German Embassy; Madame Hengelmüller von Hengelvar, wife of the Minister from Austria-Hungary; and Madame Infante, wife of the First Secretary of the Chilean Legation. All these are youthful mothers, who give all the spare moments left them by manifold social duties, to the care of their little ones. The youngest of the children is Madame Infante's, a baby born on American soil, but christened a native of that warm land so far below the Equator, called Chile. As the latest born of Embassy children, this youngster is the petted favorite of all the others, and is the object of attention every day when an American nurse takes him forth for a ride in his sumptuous baby-carriage. Madame Infante herself is a dark-eyed, very beautiful woman of the full South American type, and is greatly liked in Washington because of her invariably gracious and charming manner. Madame von Hengelvar's little child has advanced to the dignified age of shoes and stockings and short clothes. He can even walk and say a few words. He is a true Austrian, for he is very fond of playing with the national colors of his country, although he has yet to see his native land for the first time. He can say as many German words as English. He is his father's playfellow, for even a father with such a large handle to his name as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary finds time to romp with his children. A plump and very typical German is Anna, the little daughter of Countess Quadt. This little girl's father, the First Secretary of the German Embassy, is noted in Washington for his grave, dignified bearing, his seriousness of purpose. In the house with his sweet little daughter, however, he unbends, and tells wonderful stories of fairies who used to people the shores of the Rhine. He has told her many legends of Baden-Baden, and it is to this particular German resort

German housewife, and finds her greatest pleasure in the care of her little girl.

Among the children of Ministers from tropical lands, one of the handsomest and chubbiest is the pretty daughter of Senor Don Calvo, from Costa Rica. This youngster is devoted to a very ordinary gray tom-cat. She also has a fox-terrier that is all white save the black markings on its left ear. These two "live dolls," as she calls them, are her companions in play. Portugal is well represented in Washington not only by Viscount de Santo Amaro, but by his two very small and very sweet little daughters. These little ladies of the Portuguese Embassy have a dark skin of the race from which they sprang, but otherwise are not different from other babies of the Legation. They make a very pretty contrast indeed with the fair little playmates from other Legations and from American homes.

One of the tiniest specimens of British humanity in our Capitol City is Baby Frances Crackenthorn, daughter of the Third Secretary of the British Embassy. Every day last winter, in bright, sunshiny weather, she may be seen riding in state in her little landau, which is closed just like the state carriage of the British ambassador himself. A ruddy-faced English nurse, little Frances up and down the block, and she is off to all the distinguished British travelers who come to pay their respects to the Ambassador.

Of all the children of foreigners in Washington, the most interesting at this particular time are the children of the Chinese officials. Minister V. T. Fang's children may be seen very frequently about with their father in a gayly colored automobile. In summer they go to Cape May and romp in the sand just like American children, though in Washington, and especially indoors, they are often obliged to wear Chinese clothing, like their papa's and mamma's, for the sake, and out of respect to their own country.

The particular Chinese children shown in the picture printed with this story, are the three sturdy youngsters of the First Interpreter of Legation. Outdoors they dress like the children of other Legation officials, whom they pass the noon hour, and their games are as much American as their Yankee playmates. The next door. Among their comrades is little Shen Tung, First Secretary of Legation. Another favorite ite in foreign child life in Washington is little Eleanor Reliance, daughter of one of the Secretaries of the French Legation. She is one of the other children who are allowed to talk to them in their own tongue, saying "beau-tyful" for pretty boy, and so on.

On Egg-Rolling Day, Monday, all the foreign children may be seen at one time on the White House grounds. It is their turn to stare at the faces of their American cousins; but the staring usually ends in a game with the others and in leading a roll colored eggs with hands gently that the eggs will not break. They have their parties four times a year, just like the folks, first at one house and then at another, each in turn. At Christmas-time, they all have the Claus and Christmas-tree hanging presents to one another on the evergreen. From time, Mr. and Mrs. McKim meet the foreign children, and the Executive and his wife have favorites whom they like to receive informally at the White House.

HURRYING RELIEF TO CHINA'S SUFFERERS

Another 15,000 Taels Sent to Shansi by Our Committee --- A Grateful Message from Governor of Stricken Province -- Progress of the Fund

ENCOURAGING news comes from China, showing that the great generosity of Christian America in coming to the rescue of the famine-stricken people of that unfortunate land, is already producing substantial results. Prince Ching, the military governor of Peking, and His Excellency, Earl Li Hung Chang, the Imperial Viceroy, as representing the Emperor, have cabled from the palace at Peking, on July 3, to Minister Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister in Washington, as follows: "Our cablegram of the 28th of June has been received and contents transmitted to Shansi Governor who has just telegraphed us his reply, requesting us to convey, through you, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sincere expression of thanks for the kind remittance of relief funds."

It is a personal message of grateful acknowledgment from these high officials to every contributor to the relief fund, and shows how highly the rendered is appreciated by Emperor Kwang-shu and his Government. This year, owing to the general crop failure and to the recent war, the annual tribute from the provinces to the Imperial Government will be almost nominal. But the Government, during its enforced exile in Shansi, has endured many privations in common with the people of that province, and will doubtless be content to conduct affairs as simply as possible at Peking, until the suffering is over and prosperity returns to Chi-li.

The Missionary Relief Committee is urging forward the relief work in Shansi with due vigor. Immediately after the receipt of the second remittance of $20,000, cabled by the Relief Fund, Chairman Arthur H. Smith sent this message from Peking, July 10:

"LOPSCH, New York.

"Sending fifteen thousand taels to Shansi to-day."

It is the equivalent of about $10,000, showing that one-half of the entire remittance goes to the scene of greatest suffering. The remainder (although not referred to in the cablegram), is doubtless allotted for distribution in Shensi, Shantung and Chi-li.

In their journey to Shansi from Peking, the returning missionaries (including, probably, the relief men), seem to have followed the land route, which leads across the Chi-li plains to Pao-ting-fu, a three day run of one hundred and twenty miles. Although several cities and towns are passed en route, much of the distance is a rough a comparative wilderness, which has been rendered still more barren and sterile by the onslaught of rain. At Pao-ting-fu there is a mission of the American Board, which would afford a resting place for the tired travelers. To Hwai-lu (or wuy-luh), is another three days' travel. This is the last post on the Chi-li plain, and there the native carts are exchanged for swinging mule-litters, which are better adapted for the hill country.

Eight days more are consumed in the journey to Tai-yuen-fu in Shansi, through roads that are dry and sterile, across difficult passes and up steep gorges. The roads, in the rainy season, are converted into canals and in some become raging torrents, all being well-nigh impassable for man or beast; but this year even the mountain gorges are dry and dusty. All vegetation is withered and scorched up.

A traveler of the China Inland Mission, Stanley D. Smith, writes this description of the crossing of the mountains into Shansi on a former occasion:

"The journey was most difficult, not to say dangerous. We had to skirt a narrow ledge, while masses of rock, varying from a few to many pounds in weight, kept falling; nor had we to ford streams, the currents of which were so swift that many times they were nearly carried off their legs, while now again they would have the greatest difficulty with the four beasts of burden. The day before they arrived at Hung-tung, they were crossing over the two ranges of hills that separate the Ping-yang and Tai-yuen plains. In these mountain-passes there are numerous narrow gorges or defiles, whose almost perpendicular walls are sometimes a hundred feet high. In these defiles, when the rainy season is on, there often occur landslips of greater or less magnitude. If the landslip be small, it forms a quagmire, sometimes covering part of the surface of the road, sometimes the whole of it, rice consumed; their meals, according to the number of bowls of it boiled; and their exertions according to the quantity wanted. Every substitute for this favorite food is considered meagre and indicative of the greatest wretchedness. When they cannot obtain a sufficient quantity to satisfy their appetites, they supply the deficiency with an equal weight of water. . . . They maintain that it is rice only which can properly sustain the life of a human being.

Interest in the Famine Relief Work continues to grow as the work itself progresses. From every State in the Union come letters of warmest sympathy, commending the work and bringing contributions to the Fund. It is a gratifying indication of deep spiritual interest in China's future, when so many of God's people on this side of the globe are reaching out, with prayer and gift, to aid the missionaries in their life-saving crusade. "May God's blessing go with my gift," is the universal utterance. "Give and it shall be given unto you," write many who claim the promise that follows upon cheerful giving in a good cause. Every single letter is a prayer; every mail is freighted with those earnest petitions, so fervent, so sincere, that their influence pervades and consecrates the entire work. "I pray," writes Mrs. M. A. D., Barnes, Kan., "that the day is not far distant when China will gladly accept spiritual food from the once-hated foreigner." "That some life may be saved and some soul brought into the kingdom," writes Miss Grace D., Centre Road, Pa. A group of friends at Hastings, Minn., send a joint offering through Mary M. C., who writes: "May God's rich blessing attend your Christian workers in the great effort to alleviate the sufferings of the human family, God's creatures, is the sincere wish and prayer of one who would like so much to be able to do much more."

All contributions to the Famine Relief Work should be addressed: China Famine Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns.

TYPES OF CHINESE PEASANT CHILDREN

We shall expect soon to hear, direct from Shansi, cheering reports of the progress of the relief work there, which is progressing under the auspices of a friendly Governor, Chan Chun Hsien, and with the co-operation of the native relief committees. One can already picture the delight with which our bearers of food and blessing have been received in that far-away land, both by the converts and the heathen, who have been fighting a grim battle with death for many months, buoyed up only by the knowledge that help was on the way.

Why American Aid Will Be Appreciated

AMERICAN relief has heretofore been extended to Chinese famine sufferers, and it was then shown that this could be done effectively. In the fall of 1898, after the floods of the Yellow River, there was great distress among the people, and Consul Fowler, of Chefoo, was of great aid in affording relief. At that time one million people were in distress and were grateful for the aid which was given them; but of course the suffering was nothing like the present widespread famine in the province of Shansi.

The province of Shansi, under ordinary conditions, is a very productive one, and there can be no doubt that if the inhabitants can be helped through their present fearful period of distress, they will be able to provide for themselves. The province has coal, iron and petroleum, and before the Boxers' outbreak a contract had been granted to an Anglo-Italian syndicate for working the mineral deposits in central and southern Shansi. There was also the privilege of building railroads and cutting canals, to join trunk lines or navigable rivers. It was said to be the greatest industrial concession ever granted by China.

The Russo-Chinese Bank also had a contract with the Chinese Government for a railway 140 miles long, from Tai-yu-an-fu, the capital of Shansi, to Cheng-ting-fu, in the province of Chi-li, the first large city south of Pao-ting-fu, the capital of Chi-li. Pao-ting-fu is on the proposed trunk line from Hankau to Peking. This contract includes mining privileges and the building of necessary branch roads.

It should also be known that the Viceroy and other officials of Shansi province are reckoned among the ablest officials in the Chinese Empire. They have the confidence of Li Hung Chang and of Minister Wu, who feel sure that with their co-operation the famine relief extended by the United States could be made effective and would reach the people who are so sorely in need of it. TRAVELING IN CHINA

As in the days of Confucius so to-day, the methods of travel and transportation in China are unchanged. The photograph on the left shows a "freight train" (i.e. caravan) crossing the country. In some such way our missionaries travel. That on the right shows a caravan entering a city. Compare with our own express trains.

God grant it may have reached in time to save many lives.

The great scarcity of rice, and the famine prices at which the present meagre stock is held, make it imperative that some substitute, such as millet, should be largely used in the Chinese famine provinces this season. No substitute, however, can alienate the Chinamen's love for his favorite cereal. A writer who has traveled much among the Chinese, says:

The chief thing they wish and work for is rice; their domestic accounts are entirely regulated by the quantity of

Counterfeits of Religion

WE admit some of the charges against those who profess religion. Some of the most gigantic swindles of the present day have been carried on by members of the Church. There are men standing in the front rank in the churches who would not be trusted for five dollars without good collateral security. They leave their business dishonesties in the vestibule of the church as they go in and sit at communion. Having concluded the sacrament, they get up, wipe the wine from their lips, go out, and take up their sins where they left off. To serve the Devil is their regular work; to serve God a sort of play-spell. With a Sunday sponge they expect to wipe off from their business slate all the past week's inconsistencies. You have no more right to take such a man's life as a specimen of religion than you have to take the twisted irons and split timbers that lie on the beach at Coney Island as a specimen of an American ship. It is time that we drew a line between religion and the frailties of those who profess it.

They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him. Titus 1: 16.

Gloomy Prophecies

WHEN will pessimism get through its work, and forever quit the earth? My opinion is that it will not go until the world is burned up, and as pessimism slips off the last hot rock, into the perdition from which it ascended, it will cry out, "Just as I told you! Everything gone to smash!" It would be useful to review the evil prophecies of the last few years, and see how they have failed of fulfillment. "Cuba will never submit to American ideas, and choose republican form of government." But Cuba has submitted, and has chosen a republican form of government. "The Filipinos can never be made to behave themselves, and Aguinaldo will never be taken." But the Filipinos are being brought into line, and Aguinaldo has so long been a prisoner that he ceases to be an object of interest to most of us. "China will be divided up and will cease to exist as a nation." But the whole world has united in the determination that the Chinese nationality must not be destroyed. "We have such a late, cold spring, that the harvests will be ruined." But at the present writing the coming crops promise to be something glorious, and if not greater than some previous harvests, great enough to call for a doxology reaching from New York Narrows to the Golden Horn of the Pacific. "The Nicaraguan Canal will put Great Britain and the United States into early conflict, and England's warships will be in New York harbor, and United States warships will appear in Liverpool harbor." But these two English nations are now having such a loving courtship that it is positively embarrassing to outsiders, who blush at accidentally having come upon the fond couple. "The war between labor and capital is becoming more and more severe, and will yet ruin the country." But men of wealth are now making such mighty contribution for the education and redemption of all classes, that the men of toil are saying, "The more money the boss makes the better I like it, for see those libraries he is opening, those hospitals he is endowing, those churches he is building. What splendid things he is doing with his millions!" "But have you not read of the labor strikes?" Oh, yes, there are not so many of them as there used to be, nor so violent, nor so far-reaching.

Do any of us remember the railroad strike that was three thousand miles long? The time is not far off when the capitalists and the laborers will come into such conference and explanation that the last strike in all the earth will be declared off, and in front of that factory on the Merrimac, or the Chattahoochee, the soft, white hand of the manufacturer, and the hard, browned hand of the wage-earner will be clasped at the close of the last industrial conflict.

The older we get the more difficult it is to appreciate that the millennium is fast coming. But the procession is now forming which will celebrate the first victory of all that is good over all that is evil. We may not be here to see the marching of the bannered brigades, but we will look down and watch them from the King's galleries.

If any of our readers want to go on the accommodation train that stops at Slough of Despond, and Doubt Junction, they may do so. As for ourselves, we prefer the "through train."

Whoso is wise and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord. Ps. 107: 43.

Minister's Sore Throat

THE drug stores are full of troches, lozenges, and compounds for speakers and singers. All these medicines have an important mission, but how much better would it be to avoid the ills than to spend one's time in trying to cure them! We say to all young ministers, speak naturally. Let not incompetent elocutionists or the barbarisms of custom give you tones or enunciations at war with those that God implanted? Study the vocal instrument and then play the best tune on it possible; but do not try to make a flute sound like a trumpet, or a bagpipe do the work of a violin.

Remember that the throat and lungs were no more intended to speak with than the whole body. If the vocal organs get red hot during a religious service, while the rest of the body does not sympathize with them, there will be inflammation, irritation and decay. But if the man shall, by appreciation of some great theme of time and eternity, go into it with all his body and soul, there will be an equalization of the whole physical organism, and bronchitis will not know whether to attack the speaker in his throat, right knee or left ankle, and while it is deciding at what point to make assault the speaker will go scot-free. The man who besieges an audience only with his throat attempts to take a castle with one gun, but he who comes at them with head, eyes, hand, heart, feet, unlimbers against it a whole park of artillery. Then Sebastopol is sure to be taken.

He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street. Isa. 42: 2.

How to Spoil Children

IT is easy enough to spoil a child. No great art is demanded. Only three or four things are requisite to complete the work. Make all the nurses wait on him and fly at his bidding. Let him learn never to go for a drink, but always have it brought to him. At ten years of age, have Bridget tie his shoe-strings. Let him strike auntie because she will not give him a sugar-plum. He will soon learn that the house is his realm, and he is to rule it. He will come up into manhood one of those precious spirits that demand obeisance and service, and with the theory that the world is his oyster, which with knife he will proceed to open. If that does not spoil him, buy him a horse. We congratulate any man who can afford to own a horse; but if a boy own one, he will probably ride on it to destruction. He will stop at the tavern for drinks. He will bet at the races. There will be room enough in the same saddle for idleness and dissipation to ride, one of them before and one of them behind. But if the child be insensible to all such efforts to spoil him, try the plan of never saying anything encouraging to him. If he do wrong, thrash him soundly; but if he do well, keep on reading the newspaper, pretending not to see him. But if you have a child invulnerable to all other influences, and he cannot be spoiled by any means already recommended, give him plenty of money, without any questions as to what he does with it.

It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. Lamentations 3: 27.

It Has Arrived

THE millennium has begun. It may take years for it to get in full blast, but in the unparalleled bestowments by Carnegie and Rockefeller, and Morgan and Pearson, and a hundred other generous souls, I see the first rush of that beneficence which is to furnish the means for the world's education and evangelization. The most expensive machinery for the world's betterment will be put in motion. All the great philanthropies and missionary movements have been desperately in need of funds. At last, we see the sign that all the world's resources are going to be opened for God and righteousness. These uncounted millions are the first drops, not of a shower, but of a deluge of mercy, kindness, and ransom. Do not talk about the millennium as something away off in the distance. It has started. Praise God for the way in which he is opening the flood-gates of helpfulness for all nations. One of us were looking for certain great blessings for the world and the church at the opening of the first year of the new century. We were disappointed because that kind of blessing did not come. But here we find a blessing that we did not expect. We are going to have all the treasuries of Christian effort filled, and to these human instrumentalities I hope the Divine benediction will be added. Let individuals, and churches, and nations shake hands over the fact that the miller has begun.

The kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it. Rev. 21: 24.

A Hallowed Scene

AMONG the places held in reverence for the hallowed associations, the hill-top pictured on the first page stands pre-eminent. It was to the Mount of Olives that our Lord led his disciples on the last of that wonderful association with them, in his risen day. They were to see his face no more on earth and they were to see it last in familiar surroundings. Betrayed, the quiet retreat to which they had often accompanied him, lay in full view, and the very ground they were treading had been often pressed by his revered footsteps. He was about to take leave of them, though probably they did not know it. But after those forty days of converse, there must have been some arrangement prepared for the separation. In a few brief impressive words, he gave them the commission which was the beginning of that mighty movement, which now is pressing on to encircle the whole world and then, in the act of blessing them, he disappeared.

It was a close to his ministry in fit harmony with the simple dignity which had characterized it throughout. It left the little band, not heartbroken and despairing, as they had been at the foot of Calvary, but, as Luke tells us, "full of joy" and prepared to obey his commands. Truly a hallowed spot that must ever to every man that loves Christ. As he looks around on the calm, peaceful scenes, he realizes that it was on those hills and fields that our Lord's gaze rested in the last time in his earthly pilgrimage. It is no wonder that the early Christians built a church there, and that men of every race go there to meditate and worship. To no other being who ever trod this earth has the homage of races so diverse been offered, and the Gospel is carried farther and farther into the realms of spiritual darkness, it is found to be acceptable to people of every clime, and proves not only to Jew and Greek, but to Arab and Mongol and African and every other race, the power of God unto salvation.

Are we not justified, too, in thinking that that mountain-top may be the scene of a far more glorious event? The angels who spoke to the bewildered men who stood gazing after their departed Lord, told them that, "This Jesus who was received from you up to heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye beheld him going into heaven." Zechariah says that "in that day his feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives;" and the scene of the close of his humiliation will probably be the scene of the beginning of his earthly glory, when every knee shall bow and every tongue call him Lord.

India's Sympathy for China

From The Bombay Guardian

THE heroic and successful efforts made and still continued by Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the relief of famine in India have recently attracted the attention of the Chinese. For no the two northern provinces of Shansi and Shensi are the throes of famine, Earl Li, the foremost statesman in China, sent a cablegram: "Conditions warrant immediate action." This message is rightly regarded as being really the American people, whose mouthpiece in relation to the famine and many other international benefactions, has been THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A pathetic appeal has been circulated in China by the Shansi officials, a translation furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the Chinese Consul in New York. It asserts that terrible amount of extreme hunger—the eating of human flesh—taking place in some villages. With characteristic promptness, subscription lists are already opened and fully announced, including $100 each from the President and Secretary of State of the U. S. A. Thus not only U. S. citizens, but the leaders of the Government come forward publicly as Christians and personally give money for the relief of suffering in a foreign land, in which their own people have so recently been engaged on active military service.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Russian Pageant

MORE than in almost any European country, the civil ruler in Russia is identified with the ecclesiastical system. The picture on this page is of a scene on the great Nicolai Place in St. Petersburg, in which the Czar and his court are seen reviving a procession of bishops and priests, with the same impressiveness as if it were the parade of a division of the army. The supremacy of the reigning monarch in the church is traced back to Vladimir First, who ascended the throne in the year 980. He made a union of Mohammedanism, Judaism and Christianity, and having decided in favor of the last, commanded his people to be baptized, and threw the images that they had worshipped into the Dneiper. There was at first great popular resentment, but eventually the people yielded, and Christianity was established by law. At first, the government of the church was controlled by the Patriarch of Constantinople, but Peter the Great was not the kind of man to tolerate the interference of a foreign potentate in the church of his dominions. A curious fact, however, shows that though Peter would make himself supreme in matters of doctrine and ritual, his power had its limits. He wished to assimilate the Greek Church, as far as possible, to the rest of Europe, and one step in that direction was his command to the priests to shave. So determined was the opposition to this enactment that even Peter was compelled to yield. To this day the Russian priest wears his beard, and among the Order are some of the finest beards in the world. The order and ritual of the church differs but little from that of the church of Rome, but refusing to acknowledge the authority of the Pope, the Greek Church makes a difference of far-reaching influence. Still more important is it that there is no recirculation of the Scriptures, and the study of them is enjoined by the church. The constitution of the church distinctly affirms that "All the articles of faith are contained in the Word of God; that is in the Old and New Testaments." The government of the church is vested in the Holy Synod, an assembly of twelve members, all of whom are appointed by the Emperor, and are removable at any time at his pleasure. Attempts have been made both by the Pope and the Anglican Church to find a basis of union with the Greek Church, but to this day the union has not been effected in either case. The church continues intact and solitary, and the result has been an unusual degree of intolerance. The summary fashion in which it recently excommunicated the most famous of its members—Count Tolstoi—is an indication of its spirit. Like the Romish Church, the Russo-Greek Church claims to be the only true church, and regards all outsiders as heretics and schismatics. Heavily, however, the final judgment does not rest with any church, but with him who seeth the heart.

Lord knoweth them that are his (II. Tim. 2:19).

Homes by Lottery

A strange scene was witnessed at El Reno, O. T., on July 10 and the next two days. Following upon the proclamation of President McKinley, opening up settlement by the whites the thirteen thousand acres in Kiowa-Comanche country, the first registration of homeseekers was made on that day. Hundreds were lined before the various registration booths when darkness came the previous night. The registration continued all that day and the two following days, and all had an opportunity to file their names. The drawing by lottery will begin on July 29, and until then none of the 50,000 applicants will know whether or not they have been fortunate enough to receive a homestead. Hundreds of people slept in the streets all night to maintain their places in lines which began forming at the registration booths. Many had waited on the border of the new country for two years or more, and the last night of their long vigil was the most trying they had experienced. Their anxiety for the result of the lottery, after the long suspense will be intense, and three out of every four must be disappointed. What a pity it is that the offer which God makes of an eternal inheritance to all who seek it through Christ should not arouse a similar effort, for none who comply with the conditions of that offer will be disappointed.

That they may receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among them who are sanctified (Acts 26:18).

The Disappearing Desert

A remarkable discovery of water in Southern California is reported in the Los Angeles Times. It says that a despatch has been received from San Bernardino, announcing the sinking of an artesian well on the Mojave Desert, near Victor, by persons who were drilling for oil. At a depth of less than two hundred feet there was a gush of water of nearly two hundred inches. The editor says that the result to that neighborhood will be more beneficial than if the engineers had found oil. He recalls the fact that at the other end of the Colorado Desert, near Yuma, a supply of water has been found in such abundance that a stream is now flowing deep enough to be navigated by a steam launch. The fact that so much water exists near the surface is believed to indicate that all the deserts will soon disappear, and that the next generation will have no other way of learning what an American desert looks like than by pictures of something that once existed but has altogether disappeared. The discovery may encourage similar experiments in other lands, and so the way be prepared for the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy:

The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose (Isaiah 35:1).

A Miner's Disappointment

There was a broken-hearted man on the streets of a town in Kentucky a few days ago. He came from the mining regions of Idaho, where he had been working for thirteen years. He is known there as one of the most successful miners in that section. He was among the poorest when he reached Idaho, but now he owns a mine and has several well-paying interests. His return to Kentucky was for the purpose of finding his niece and her mother, who, at the time of his becoming a miner, were as poor as himself. In fact, they were scarcely able by their utmost exertions in sewing for the tailors of the town to provide the necessities of life. Before going to Idaho, the man had promised them that if he was successful he would provide for them, and, being a bachelor, with no nearer relatives, he resolved to make them his heiresses. But for all the thirteen years of his absence he had not communicated with them. When he returned to Kentucky, he took with him ten thousand dollars wrapped up in a package for them. He pleased himself on his journey by imagining their surprise and delight when he would place it in their hands. But he could not find them at the house where they formerly lived, and when he made inquiries about them in the town he learned that both were dead. They had become so discouraged by their hardships that they had committed suicide. The man's grief was intense, and it was increased by the thought that if he had only written to them when he began to prosper, telling them what he intended to do, they would not have committed the fatal act. He is only one of many who find that they have put off a good act so long, that when they are ready to do it, it is impossible. Unhappily too many make that discovery in the affairs of their souls. They intend to make their peace with God at some future time, but are cut off without doing it.

He found no place for repentance though he sought it carefully and with tears (Heb. 12:17).

Protected by Injunction

A novel method of protecting a home from the machinations of a designing man has been adopted by a husband in Michigan. He has lived happily with his wife for two years, but a few months ago a handsome man, with plenty of money, came to the town and made the wife's acquaintance. By his charms of manner and his presents, he made an impression upon her, and the husband found that her affections were being alienated. During the interloper's temporary absence, she became the same loving, contented woman she was before, but on his return, she again became cold and complaining. Her husband had no difficulty in connecting the change in her demeanor with the visits of this man, and he spoke of it freely. His friends advised him to get a divorce, but as he loved his wife and was sure that in her heart she loved him, he would not take that course. Finally he invoked the protection of the law in another way. He applied to the court for an injunction perpetually restraining his rival from visiting his wife, or communicating with her, by letter or messenger, directly or indirectly. On his stating the facts the injunction was granted. The effect will probably be good, if the wife is at heart true to her husband, for the interloper will now be liable to punishment for contempt of court if he seeks to influence her. The dread of that punishment will doubtless keep him away, for men who show contempt for God's Word fear to disobey a court which punishes promptly.

Because sentence on an evil work is not executed speedily, the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil (Eccles. 8:11).

BRIEF NOTES

A Bible study conference will be held at Seaclyff, July 23-30. Many eminent scholars are expected to participate in the proceedings. A programme, and full information, may be obtained by addressing Rev. A. C. Gaebelein, 80 Second street, New York.

The death of Professor John Fiske, of Cambridge, on July 4, at Gloucester, Mass., takes from the American world of letters its ablest, most brilliant and most conscientious historian. He was also one of our greatest philosophers, and his works on evolution commanded the respect of the most eminent European scholars.

The Sultan of Turkey has remitted to the State Department in Washington ninety-five thousand dollars, in payment of the claims for American property destroyed in his territories. The bulk of the amount is due to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for the buildings and personal property destroyed in Armenia. There are other claims, and our Government will distribute the total amount pro rata. It has taken many years of hard work on the part of our diplomats to extract payment and other governments have not been so successful.

After nearly six years' labor, the five bishops and five clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church who were constituted a committee of revision of the Bible, have completed their work. The changes they have made do not appear in the text, but in the margins as alternative readings. They are practically those made by the Revisers of 1881-5, but the difference is that the old text of the Authorized Version is retained and the margin alone contains the emendations. If the Convention of the Church adopts the book, it will be optional with the clergyman to read or not the words in the margin instead of those in the text, in all cases or in any one case.

Half-Hearted or Whole-Hearted?

ABRAHAM AND LOT

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUG. 4. GEN. 13: 1-18 -- GOLDEN TEXT: WHATSOEVER YE WOULD THAT MEN SHOULD DO TO YOU, DO YE EVEN SO TO THEM. MATT. 7: 12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Craft

ABRAM'S first stage of progress began in separation from the wicked, and we are now to see him start a second stage of advancement by separation from half-hearted goodness. Good Lord, deliver us, not alone from the companionship of the bad, but also from that of the goody and goodish and good-for-nothing, of whom Lot is the type.

That Abraham himself was by no means faultless, we are reminded by the thrilling adventure that occurred in Egypt in the time that intervened between the last lesson story and this one (Gen. 12: 10-20). From a famine in Canaan, Abraham had fled to Egypt, apparently without consulting God. Better to be hungry in Canaan, to which God had sent him, than to be full in Egypt at the peril of the soul. Better bring up a family in poverty in Christian surroundings, than in wealth where the soul's health is more jeopardized. The ruling Pharaoh caught sight of Abraham's beautiful wife, Sara, and Abraham at once concluded that he would have to die if he did not lie. We need not attribute this to his primitive morality, for the editor of one of the leading religious papers of the United States has argued long and earnestly that it is right to lie to save life, which means, reduced to its lowest terms, that it is better in such cases to trust in a lie than to trust in God. Abraham thought so, too, and said of his wife: "She is my sister." Those who classify lies, would call it a "white lie" or a gray one, for she was both sister and wife, that being a time in the world's early growth when marriage was not limited even by closest relationships. But even such a half lie only made matters worse. Pharaoh took Sara to be his wife, and Abraham seemed to have saved his life at the cost of his wife's purity. But God interposed and warned Pharaoh, who gave back Sara to Abraham, with the rebuke of a heathen for his falsehood—a rebuke that should be taken to heart by all who in extreme cases think it safer to trust the Father of lies than the God of truth. Whenever and wherever it is counted justifiable for one to lie to save anything, as in China, the very foundation of society, trust in the word of others, is destroyed. Alas, Abraham was not cured of lying by that taste of its alluring but bitter fruit (Gen. 20). Beside Peter lying to save his life, behold Christ dying for the truth, and choose your leader.

Back they came, Abraham, Sara, Lot and all their caravan, to Canaan, where the grass was still scant for their increasing flocks. The herdmen of Abraham and those of Lot therefore quarreled over the pasturage and the scanty water supply, in the very presence of the heathen Canaanites and Perizzites, who exulted, no doubt, in such an indication that these godly people were not so much better than other folks as they pretended to be. The quarrel of the servants of Abraham and Lot might have developed into such a family feud as in certain American States is often passed down from generation to generation. To fill hearts made for love with grudges and hatred is both folly and sin. Even in that warlike age Abraham gave a lesson of peace that is yet needed. "Let there be no strife, for we be brethren." Such a spirit would have prevented most of the quarrels and wars in which the brotherhood of man has been dishonored. August is a fitting time of talk of this quarrel averted, for August is the month when more crimes are committed than in any other month, many of them growing out of quarrels, which rise in number with the thermometer. It is hard to "keep cool" in the moral sense when you cannot keep cool in the literal sense. But a clear recognition that August is "extra-hazardous" ought to enable us to lay in extra patience to match.

Even when it had been decided by Abraham and Lot that they should separate for peace, if Abraham had insisted on his "rights" there would have been a new quarrel. He rather claimed the privilege to waive his right to first choice of the land. Thus Abraham won instead the blessedness of the peacemaker—and of the meek also, for a little black boy in a missionary class in Jamaica defined the meek as "Those who give soft answers to rough questions." Dean Stanley told a crowd of children of another old man who was at once as brave and gentle as Abraham, in whose boyhood grammar had been found the motto, "Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace to silence envious tongues. Be just and fear not." Anthony Blanc, one of Felix Neff's earlier converts, was very earnest in winning souls to Christ. The enemies of the Gospel were angry at his success, and used alike scoffs and threats against him. One night, as he was returning home from a religious meeting, he was followed by a man in a rage, who struck him a violent blow on the head. "May God forgive and bless you!" was Anthony's quiet and Christian rejoinder. "Ah!" replied his assailant furiously, "if God does not kill you, I'll do it myself!" Some days afterwards Anthony met the same person in a narrow road, where two persons could hardly pass. "Now I shall be struck by him again," he said to himself. But he was surprised, on approaching, to see this man, once so bitter towards him, reach out his hand, and say to him, in a tremulous voice, "Mr. Blanc, will you forgive me, and let all be over?" Thus, this disciple of Christ, by gentle and peaceful words, had made a friend of an enemy.

Lot accepted first choice, because selfishness was first in his life, and chose the most fertile land though it was at the gate of the wickedest of cities. He would risk the souls of all his household to be rich. We know how this greed failed every way. Twice he lost all his property (chaps. 14 and 19), and he very nearly lost all his character besides. As carefully as the potter, working on the costliest vase guards it against every grain of flying dust, should we guard character in ourselves and others in formative years of youth against corrupting influences of every kind.

Let us move out of Egypt, but let us not straightway move toward Sodom, as did Lot, whose life was every way almost, if not quite, a failure, in spite of all the mean and perilous things he was willing to do in order to win worldly gain. He illustrates Christ's declaration of the failure of selfishness, "He that saveth his life shall lose it."

Lift up now thine eyes. Here we see Abraham proving the truth of that other saying of Christ, "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." History is Unselfishness the Way to Success full of instances that show that the man who is most likely to succeed in the long run is the man who forgets himself in obeying God and serving others. The Golden Rule of doing for others wins more—even of wealth, as a rule—than "doing others." The revised version of the Rule is, "Do as you have been done by," but a business house built on that rule is soon swept away. Lot had selected a plain—fertile then, but destined to be the arid bed and shore of a "Dead Sea." Abraham seemed to have lost the best land by his over-generous proposal, and was perhaps de-plunging into sin; but the reveller's joy is short, while headache and heartache are long. "A good time," says again, "is one that don't go off with the having."

In Old Testament times God gave earthly "riches and honor," to those who served him faithfully (Prov. 3: 10). Heaven and heavenly-mindedness are now seen to be nobler rewards; but even a large measure of God seems to make the righteous as prosperous as he can, and not destroy righteousness itself by making men feign it for its earthly rewards (Read Luke 6: 20, 21; Rom. 8: 16, 17; II. Tim. 3: 12; att. 6: 33; I. Cor. 3: 21; Phil. 4: 19). The writers have occasion to know the religious standing of the rich men in a hundred cities, and they are mostly professedly Christian men. Many of them are open to criticism for the way they get and spend their wealth, and riches easily lead to the vices and luxuries, but these rich men of our country largely owe their success to the fact that in young manhood they were guarded by a Christian profession. The young men who spend their substance in Sunday picnics and champagne suppers, seldom develop enough of physical and mental vigor or of reputation to be trusted with those positions that lead to abiding wealth.

But let no one think success waits on wealth. Many of the world's greatest heroes have dared to die poor. Of those selected as America's greatest men for the New York temple of fame, on two or three could be considered rich and probably but one was a millionaire and he was made so by a great invention. In our sober judgment, it is the men who were richest in great thought in statesmanship, eloquence, poetry, philosophy, discovery, science, theology, that we place the front line of success.

What if Abraham had been like the rulers of our "great Powers" to-day, and, regarding peace as a mere dream in this wicked world, had rushed or more servants to fight his right to first choice of land and for the best chance at Sodom's markets? Most of the wars of the world have been fought and markets, and few have been waged on so clear a claim as Abraham's. Imagine him attacking Lot and his servant and flocks, and driving them from their pasturage, and then each family fortifying its camp, keeping a lot of servants always armed and on guard, who the workers must equip and supply, each buying more guns to fight the other, until the cost of arms became one of the chief expenses of life! Every time while they fight, and whichever proves stronger is declared to be right, and the other is led into poverty to pay "recompense" for being the weaker in the fray.

Even from a commercial point of view, war seldom pays its expenses, and when moral issues and race hatreds are added, we believe that every recreant who has cost more than it was worth. "Let there be no strife, for we be brethren."

The words have yet closer application to family and church quarrels. The lesson story would suggest that it is better to have two churches at peace than one at war. When we cannot work together in one field, let us agree to separate, but few quarrels of good people would last if the one whose rights were clearest, like Abraham, claimed the privilege to waive his rights in the name of peace and brotherhood for the blessedness of the peacemaker (Matt. 5: 7).

Is it worth while that we jostle a brother,
Bearing his load down the rough road of life?
Is it worth while that we sneer at each other—
In blackness of heart that we war to the knife?
God pity us all for our pitiful strife.

Were it not well in our brief little journey
Down over the isthmus, out into the tide,
We give him a fish instead of a serpent,
Ere folding our hands to be and abide,
Forever and aye in the dust at his side?

—JOAQUIM MILLE

Probably Lot was saved (II. Pet. 2: 7, 8), through the mercy that "will not quench the smoking flax or break the bruised reed." Lot's godliness was not a light, but a smoke, and his moral character was not a cedar of Lebanon, but only a bruised reed. If he got into heaven he must have been surprised, and surely his was not an "abundant entrance," but a "narrow door," under the saying, "If the righteous scarcely be saved, how shall the ungodly and the sinners be saved?" "One star differeth from another star in glory," and the half-hearted men as Lot and Solomon and Jehu must be ashamed even in heaven that they shone with such dim and uncertain light on earth. Men shall come from the East and West and sit down in heaven with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to whose high fellowship even there Lot does not belong. And on earth, how great the contrast between Abraham's immortality in Jews and Christians, and Lot's in the detestable Moabites and Ammonites? (Gen. 19: 37, 38).

A HERDMAN WITH HIS FLOCKS ON THE PLAIN OF THE JORDAN

pressed by that fact as Lot moved away with his herds. But when he was well gone, God said to Abraham: "This land, so far as the eye can see, I give you and your countless children to possess it and to possess the earth." God counted as his seed not only the seven millions of Jews that call Abraham father, but also Christ "the seed of Abraham," and the ever increasing Christian host. "They that are of faith the same are children of Abraham." Strong in the promise, Abraham made his headquarters at Hebron, where he built an altar, and where his tomb is visited to-day by Jews, Mohammedans and Christians. And yet in all these faiths there are more persons who follow Lot to the half-failures of a half-righteous, half-selfish life, than follow God, as Abraham did, in whole-hearted, unselfish living, that leads to full success for both worlds.

Lot started to be righteous, but his righteousness got into bad order through the selfishness he tried to keep in the same heart, reminding us of the story of a clock in a prominent London church, on a main thoroughfare, where many depended on it, which recently stopped. For a few minutes no one noted the fact, and some lost appointments and missed trains because they depended on it. But ere long it was observed that the clock had stopped, and the cause was investigated. A family of larks had made a nest in the works. They were driven out and their nest removed, but it was found necessary to make a screen also to prevent their return to their accustomed place. So many a Christian life, on whose example others have relied as a guide to right living, comes to a standstill or goes backward, and it will usually be found, as with Lot, that love of money or of drink has been allowed to nest in the heart.

Lot did not find Sodom's wealth and fellowships an increase of happiness. He might have been less unhappy if he had never known God, but the memory of the purer days and nobler fellowships, when he was with Abraham, left an "aching void," and "vexed his righteous soul" (II. Peter 2: 7, 8), even when he had become "the Hon. Mr. Lot," an officer sitting in the gate. "A short life and a happy one," cries the young man,

A Suggestion for Women

FOR several summers I have watched with interest a change for the better in a certain feature of church dressing. In a great many country places, and in some of the smaller towns, women attend church during the hot weather without bonnets or hats. On the way to church they are protected from the sun by parasols, and while there they are much cooler and more comfortable without head-gear than with it. Why should not the fashion become universal? A few of us, if we have the courage of our convictions, can easily make it so. Most women dislike to be singular, but when a half dozen in any place decide upon a course, others soon follow. Leaders are hardest to find in this world where there is little of the original and so much of the imitative in the majority. I would like to go farther than the dropping of women's hats as a summer custom; I would be glad if we could take them off at all seasons in religious meetings. It is now customary in places of amusement for ladies to remove their bonnets, because they interfere with the view of those who sit behind them. A singer or a speaker cannot be seen, if a three-decker bonnet, with plumes, bows, and flowers towers between the onlooker and the platform. If instead of one such bit of millinery, there are hundreds, forming a rampart impenetrable to the eye, there is nothing for it but to shift your position uneasily till you can get an occasional glimpse, or else to hold your hands in resignation, and listen as best you may. Again and again in a church service have I found myself in the rear of a most beautiful and picturesque hat. As a hat for indoor wear, it was majestic; as a hat for outdoor wear, it was satisfactory; it was perhaps splendid. It had cost its owner time and money. My opinion was that it probably suited her style and framed a charming face. Yet, nevertheless, that lovely hat was a stumbling-block to me, stirring up my temper, moving me to indignant protest and spoiling my hour of worship.

A hat may be all right in a parlor, in a drawing-room, and on the promenade, and all wrong in the house of God. Suppose that we decide to take off our hats and hold them in our hands or laps during service; or, if we do not wish to do this, let us adopt, strictly for church and prayer-meeting, a plain, trim, closely-fitting little bonnet, something like a Shaker's cap, and let us wear that, all the year round, when we go to church.

The women who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would bring a blessed revolution to pass in this regard, they only would make up their minds to act wisely at once.

No doubt the wearing of bonnets in the public assembly is a relic of the ancient usage, which obliged women to be veiled whenever they went abroad. Modest women feel sheltered by their bonnets, and are self-conscious, and, to their own thought, conspicuous, when they lay them aside in a convocation. It might be possible to make the rule so general that she would be exceptional who should keep her bonnet on in church. A man with a hat on in a Christian assembly would look very odd. May the time come, in my time, when a woman thus adorned will seem equally queer.

show no irritation. This ought to go without saying. Never discuss a guest after she has left you, nor make her oddities a topic of discourse. The guest, too, must be in honor bound not to criticize host or hostess, or ever to reveal a secret which becomes hers through her admittance to the home of her friends. A home is a sanctuary, a sacred place, and they who violate its confidence show themselves unworthy the society of the refined and noble.

In the Sunrise Land

The Orientals excel us of the West in that dexterity and suppleness which makes them wonderful performers of legerdemain and amazingly clever acrobats. A street scene in Japan is shown in this picture. The leader of the traveling band beating his drum, while the troupe goes through the programme he indicates. It would seem that Japanese muscles were more limber than ours, yet, no doubt, American boys could imitate and even surpass these youthful gymnasts if they chose. Mothers, as it is, are apt to hold their breath when they see what their young people attempt in a gymnasia.

GOOD morrow to you, neighbor,
Though yesterday was drear,
There come full many happy days
Within the whole round year.
And God, who loves you dearly, sends
A smile for every tear.

Good morrow to you, neighbor,
Just do the best you can
In serving God, by lovingly
And truly serving man;
For you and I and all of us
Are in the Maker's plan.

Reconciling the Antagonistic

A HIGH degree of talent, and one which is allied to the very finest forms of diplomacy, is that which enables the housemother to conciliate instead of offending, to smooth over asperities, and to promote harmony. Has the good man a tendency to drift into monologue, to usurp an undue share of the conversation, and to tell the same stories over, until the repetition becomes wearisome? Far be it from the tactful wife to insinuate that her lord is tedious, to snub him by a brusque word or a bored look, or to suffer a slur upon his dignity in the family conclave. She has the art of so guiding the family boat through the most treacherous current that it never runs aground, and is never capsized. She steers people away from the theme which would involve them in fiery argument, and she enables them, one and all, to appear at their best. When a woman has mastered the gracious and charming accomplishment of putting her circle at ease, and of diffusing serenity about her, as the stars convey light, she is beloved and honored, and is as Juno among the gods. Our colleges should endow a chair for the especial study of this complex and attractive science, this skill of administration, this unwritten lore which differentiates the refined and restful home from that which is a mere shelter from the elements, or an arena of conflict. Some professor, herself a model of womanly grace, should undertake this instruction, which might broaden into a cult, and find many votaries.

Your Mother

Writing in the British Weekly, that stanch man and true gentleman, Ian MacLaren, pays a very fitting tribute to woman's work, as a mother, and speaks pertinently of the debt we owe her for her long and devoted care and service in childhood and youth. He says, and I like to think that the endorsement of his words is in ten thousand loving hearts, "If your mother be spared to you, then are you bound to make her a first charge on your life as you desire a peaceful conscience and as you shall answer before the judgment seat of God. She must be encompassed with every observance of comfort and honor and gentleness and love, with sacrifices, also, if so be it will please her, of tastes and occupations and time, and even friendships, and after you have done all that you can think of and anyone can suggest, you will still remain a hopeless bankrupt for the love wherewith she loved you.

"If she has passed from this life, and is now with God, then keep the commandments which she laid upon you in your youth, though now you be a gray-headed man, and follow in her steps, even as she followed Christ. Honor all women, and serve them in purity and chivalry for her sake."

"We have many friends," avers a Turkish proverb, "but only one mother." All through the East, even amid false religions, there is one bright spot in the honor and veneration shown to the mother, particularly as she is growing old. We cannot do better in our Western civilization than to emulate this example.

OUR HAPPY WAIFS AT BEAUTIFUL MONT-LAWN

A PICNIC at the "Tower" is one of the delights for which our waifs at Mont-Lawn are usually very eager. The "Tower" is on the top-most point of a picturesque and beautifully wooded promontory which is one of the most distinctive landmarks of the noble river. It is a steep climb to reach it. From the little windows of the Tower and from the belvedere on top of it, a view of extraordinary magnificence unrolls itself. One sees for miles and miles the river winding through green hills and valleys; crowning noble heights far and near, and on both sides of the river are the stately villas where many New York millionaires make their summer homes. The pretty town of Nyack lies two and a half miles away, at the foot of the hills. Across the river are Irvington and Tarrytown, and near the latter is the charmed spot where Sunnyside, Irving's home, nestles among the trees. Our teachers hear wonderful things, after conducting to the top of the Tower a group of children whose visions have hitherto been bounded by the narrow, dingy confines of a tenement court, where clothes-lines, burdened with wearing apparel, swing from wall to wall, shutting out sky and air; where untidy bed-clothes decorate tier after tier of fire-escapes; and where the hot, stifling atmosphere is permeated with evil smells from unsightly ash-cans and squalid rooms. We wish our readers could see the eyes of our children and hear the sweet, sad, funny, wonder-struck words they say, as this wonderland of grandeur and beauty unrolls before them. "God made the world," you tell them now, and it means something it has never meant before. All the way up the hill to the Tower is a pathway of loveliness—vines and wild flowers run riot and berries blush temptingly in the green-leaved nooks. The Tower is only a short distance from the central building and Hope Cottage, but so charming is the steep pathway leading up the hill that it takes the children a long way to make the journey. Sometimes the teachers take a lunch up the hill and there is a real picnic.

Our waifs are very proud of Hope Cottage, the pretty new memorial building, which stands as a monument to Miss Jane Hope, so many years a benefactor of our little ones. Such a beautiful dormitory it is, with its many, many little white beds, its great wide windows, and its long, roomy piazza, where it is so nice for tots to cluster about "Teachers" and hear lovely stories on rainy days. Here is a text that a little tired, sick girl found it very easy to learn when lying on her cot in Hope Cottage and gazing out of the windows: "I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord which made heaven and earth." The knowledge that good Christian people are so ready to aid them, enables many a friendless little one to more easily believe in God's loving kindness.

A MERRY MARCH AROUND HOPE COTTAGE

A VISIT TO THE TOWER

This is a letter which a little girl at Mont-Lawn wrote to his home in this city:

Dear Papa and Mamma:—There are nice Tiger lilies and Black Eye Susies and Black Berries. When we eat we get a lot of eating, and before we eat we have to say, "God is great and God is good and we thank him for his food by his hand and all be fed give us Lord our daily bread. Amen." DANIEL AND JOHN

Who knows what a blessing that letter may be to his parents? The child writing that grace to them may be God's own messenger of mercy and hope. Not only do we seek to help our tenement children physically—it is only too plain that stunted, half-starved children of poverty need such help—but we seek to give them something better than the bread which perishes. The little prayers, the brief, bright chapel services, the pretty Gospel songs, the atmosphere of love and kindness, have made a lasting influence on many a little life, but for these might have dried downward on the strong tide of temptation that surrounds the child of the streets, where beer saloons and other evil places abound. You are saving souls as well as bodies when you aid us in this work. Our readers remember "Tilly," the little ragged body whose picture appeared in an earlier issue of this paper. Tilly is motherless, her father, a poor, honest laborer, who works all day, living of necessity, his little ones by themselves. Tilly went up to Mont-Lawn with the first detachment of waifs, and had a delightful time. This is the report a missionary gives of her since her return to her tenement home: "Tilly has taught half the children in the block to sing 'Jesus loves me.' Saturday night, at ten o'clock, I counted ten little girls, with Tilly as their leader, sitting on the curb and singing that hymn. It's so awful hot and close the children can't sleep in the rooms, I know. Sometimes they stay outdoors almost all night. It rested me hearing those little girls sing that hymn. Often, when feeling discouraged because my work in the slums bears fruit so slowly, my faith has been renewed by some little child who is the better, and who makes others better, for having been at Mont-Lawn. While assurance like this comes to us through missionaries, another, and most important form of encouragement is in letters like these:

Mr. and Mrs. V., Ocean Park, California. The writers of this desire to bear the expense of two children during the whole season that Mont-Lawn is open this season; estimating the season there for at seventy-five days, and the expense at $3. for each child every ten days, we enclose P. O. Order for $45.

E. S., Woodbridge, N. J. $1. You could not do a nobler thing than giving the children of the poor this opportunity of seeing the better side of life. God bless the Children's Home.

Only $3 sends a child to Mont-Lawn for ten days in multiples of that sum you may send any number you wish. All contributions will be promptly acknowledged in these columns. Help us save the children.

Our Young Hero

HOW William Rohrer received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Medal for "Heroism and Humanity," is told in the following letter, which will interest many readers. The letter is written by Mr. Oliver Weiser, Postmaster at Delta, Pa., father of the boy whom William rescued. It was through him that William was brought to the notice of the Medal Committee, and it was to him that the Committee forwarded the medal, in order that he might have a part in the pleasure of presentation. Mr. Weiser says:

The beautiful medal was received Saturday, June 22. Sunday, was to be Children's Day in Delta Presbyterian Chapel, and it was decided that that would be the happiest occasion for giving William his medal. William attends Sabbath School Sunday morning in the Methodist Church; Sunday afternoon, in the Presbyterian; so both congregations were interested. The Children's Service in the evening, at the latter, was chosen for the presentation. A large assemblage of people were present; every available inch of seating space was taken; a number were standing, and the windows were filled with onlookers. After the well-rendered programme of the regular service, Mr. S. J. Barnett ascended the platform, and in a brief, brilliant address, showed how often the world's young heroes had developed into great men, and how they had influenced their times. Then he mentioned the establishment of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Medal Committee, just to seek out and reward the heroes and heroines of peace and so help in the development of the noble qualities of gentleness and mercy. "Out of a great number of brave, unselfish people," he said, "who had performed beautiful and blessed deeds, a Delta boy had been chosen as the one to whom the honor belonged of receiving this medal." William was called forward; he came modestly and quietly, and the medal was pinned on his coat, the inscription of the committee's gracious letter read; and then, while the blushing lad was the cynosure of all eyes, the great crowd broke into applause, long and loud continued, by old and young. Dr. Klopsch, the Committee, and all who have labored over letters and weighed evidence, and through much consideration, at last decided that this boy should be so honored, and then taken the pains to provide this handsome testimonial, would have felt amply repaid for all trouble had they seen how much pleasure they brought, not only to their hero, but to many besides.

Saving Our Boys in the East

THE wonderful revival work in the Asiatic squadrons of the British and American navies, an account of which was recently given in these columns, continues to gather force and interest. It began, as will be remembered, with work among the Marine Guard at Tientsin, extending thence to Wei-Hai-Wei, Shanghai, Hongkong, Nagasaki, and everywhere else that soldiers and sailors were brought in touch with missionaries, ashore or on man-o'-war's men. In these cultured men and women of his own race, speaking his own tongue, inviting him into their homes, visiting him aboard ship and entertaining him with addresses and lantern-slide pictures, the sailor found his first friend in the East—a friend he little expected to discover in the missionary, whom he had, through prejudice, regarded as rather a useless and uninteresting individual. Gospel songs and Gospel services became dear to him as links between himself and those who made him feel at home in strange, and sometimes hostile, lands. Through this unique revival movement, the Y. M. C. A. has received an impetus in the same localities and aboard warships in the Orient. The work among the soldiers has been recognized as being so helpful to the navy that it is being encouraged in every way by the authorities, orders being issued at Peking that everything possible be done to maintain it. Ministers of the various nations have been petitioned by the Peking Missionary Association to give a piece of land, where a Y. M. C. A. building may be erected within legation area. The Association now meets in rooms that once formed a gambling den. Hundreds of men of every nationality are in daily attendance. The coffee-room is self-supporting, and large numbers of men are beginning the Christian life in the services. "When the Australians marched home," writes Dr. Phipps from Peking, "they stopped in front of the building and sang 'God be with you till we meet again,' and then gave three cheers for the Y. M. C. A." Aboard the British warship Hermione, the U. S. warship Kentucky, and other vessels besides, Young Men's Christian Associations have been organized by request of the officers. In Tientsin, Shanghai, Hongkong, Manila, and other places, the Associations have opportunities of doing excellent work. The good influence of Miss Helen Gould's gift of the handsome Brooklyn Branch Building extends even to the East, for Jack-tar out there feels grateful to this lady for her interest in his welfare, and added respect for an organization through which such bounties come to him.

Called to Evangelism

Rev. N. B. Randall, whose Gospel labors have already been mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has lately conducted a noble evangelistic work in East Orange, N. J. He is connected with the North Church of East Orange, whose pastor, the Rev. J. Dickinson, D.D., writes concerning him in a recent issue of The Examiner: "Mr. Randall received a liberal college education, is trained for the law, and afterwards entered upon a large legal practice in Gloversville, N. Y. Converted to a happy faith in Christ while alone in his room, he could not rest of heart after his union with the church until he had decided to give up flattering worldly prospects and enter the Christian ministry. After graduation from the Rochester Theological Seminary, Mr. Randall held pastorates at Vineland, N. J., Providence, R. I., Norristown, Pa., New York City, and Summit, N. J. During these pastorates there was an ever-increasing love for evangelistic work, and, in connection with his last pastorate, Mr. Randall was for five years State evangelist for the New Jersey State Convention. Since then he has given his whole time to evangelistic work. He has held about 100 series of meetings in eight States, with many hopeful conversions."

A SETTLEMENT HOME FOR TINY CRIPPLES

BY...
MRS. B. E. MARTIN

THIS is the story of a charity whose existence is justified by the fact that there is nothing like it within the limits of the city of New York. Miss Darrach's Settlement Home for Crippled Children, at 247 West Sixty-ninth street, is truly a "settlement," for Miss Darrach lives with the children, and watches over them in their work and in their play.

The house is a small one, but exactly suited to the needs of the children. It is near the School for Crippled Children, that has been running successfully for three years in Sixty-third street, under the auspices of the Children's Aid Society, and as the inmates of the Home go back and forth in the wagonette of the society, they feel that, after all, they are very much like other children, since they go to daily lessons. They are taught at the home and at the school—to forget their braces and surgical appliances, to in and play, where this is possible, and to be merry always.

As yet the number received into the home must be limited, since funds have to be carefully husbanded, but no fashionable club, or finishing-school, ever had such a waiting list as this Settlement. Appeals come every day and from every section, for they are everywhere—these children who need help. Many are in the hospitals, whence they must soon be discharged as "incurable," discharged to return to dreary homes, or, what is worse, to homeless beggary. Cries come, too, from overcrowded tenements, where the able-bodied members of the family are absent all day long, and these maimed ones are left in loneliness; and from wretched shelters, where poverty and drunkenness have thrust the crippled child still further into the dull background of a colorless life, small hands are outstretched for aid. Without outside assistance, these children have no present and no future. They are untaught, they are cut off from the companionship of other children; their minds, often all the more alert for their physical infirmities, grow torpid or bitter under the dreary routine of a sordid existence, and their bodies are robbed of every chance of growth, or cure.

It was to change all this that the little house in Sixty-ninth street was started. It was, in its origin, the creation of one woman's loving kindness. Now it has drawn to itself and its cause many generous friends, who are really a part of the work, and who are reckoned an important factor in the Home life. But it has no "Board," no "patronesses," and no paraphernalia of any sort. It has no endowment, no state or city aid, and no salaried officials.

Miss Darrach has always felt that work of this kind prospers best, when the relations between helpers and helped are very direct and close; and it is her wish and hope that all friends and contributors will grow to know the Home, and become personal friends of the children. To this end, Wednesday afternoon has been set aside for the reception of callers; and some member of the informal Guild of Women, who have the interest of the institution at heart, is always present to welcome visitors.

So far the Home has depended upon chance donations, upon various gifts, and upon one or two regular monthly payments from friends who wish their names withheld. Of course, the work could go forward with much surer chance of success if it had a regular income, however small. The cost of maintaining each child is reckoned at $12.00 a month. Further information about the work will be found in the Crippled Children's Messenger, the monthly magazine of the Home, or Miss Darrach will answer all inquiries.

VILBUR CHAPMAN'S THREE BATTLES

How the Widely Known Evangelist Came to be a Christian Through Stress and Struggle

By Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D.D.

WILBUR CHAPMAN'S childhood home was a Christian one in every sense. His only memory of his mother was that of a sweet, devoted servant of God. When he was a lad in the Sunday School of the

Every member in the class arose with the exception of Wilbur, and he found himself reasoning thus:

"I have a Christian father and a devoted Christian mother; I am sure I must believe in Christ; why is it necessary for me to rise?"

But his Sunday School teacher, Mrs. C. C. Binckley, bending over, touched him on the shoulder and asked him if he would not confess Christ. She gently told him that if he sat still he was denying Jesus, and then putting her hand under his elbow she lifted just a little, and he was on his feet.

One of the deepest impressions of his life was made then. A few years ago, he went back to the old Sunday School room, and sat in the form with the same old teacher, and thanked God, and that teacher, from the depths of his heart, that he was led to make that public manifestation of his faith.

The second profound impression made upon young Chapman was in Oberlin College, when he was about seventeen years of age. He was living what he supposed was an average Christian life, when one of those great revivals for which Oberlin is celebrated came sweeping through the college. Meetings were being held in the Second Congregational Church, and after a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Kinkaid, Wilbur Chapman with others went to the after-meeting, and there came to him there such a conception of sin, and such a realization of the fact that he was not what God would have him be, that he felt as if he were certainly lost.

Awhile ago, Dr. Chapman was holding revival meetings in Oberlin, and one day in talking to the students he went in an after-meeting, and stood at the very spot where he fought out that second great battle, and where there came to him a peace that passeth understanding.

The third great epoch in Dr. Chapman's experience was when he was a student in Lake Forest University, Chicago, when one day he heard that Mr. Moody was to speak in the city. He had never seen Mr. Moody before, and became so charmed with him that he followed him about from one service to the other. And finally, in one of these gatherings, he had the privilege of a few moments' conversation with that great winner of souls. He told Mr. Moody of the past, but said his life was not satisfactory. One day he believed, the next day he doubted; now, since hearing Moody, he was almost in despair, because he did not know surely that he was saved. He was a student for the ministry and believed God's Word; yet he was not certain of his own salvation. Then Moody opened his Bible, and pointing out a certain verse, he asked Chapman if he believed that promise. It was the fifth chapter of John and the twenty-fourth verse: "Verily, verily I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." The young man replied, "Certainly I do." "Are you saved?" Moody said. The reply was that he was not certain. Then the evangelist said, "See here, my friend; who are you doubting?" And in an instant it flashed on Chapman's mind that he had been doubting Christ. During all his past Christian experience, Christ had been trying to impress upon him the power of his own word, and he had been blind to it. His real Christian experience, at least so far as assurance is concerned, began with that talk with Mr. Moody in Chicago, in the year 1878.

Dr. Chapman adds what I doubt not will be helpful to many readers, who will be interested in the story of the Christian progress of the soul of this man of God, who has been so signally blest in the salvation of men. "I suppose," he says "that most Christians have many mountain peaks in their experience, I have but to add one more. I was sitting in my home in the country, reading the report of the Northfield Conference, when my eye lighted upon one sentence of the Rev. F. B. Meyers, in which he said: 'If you are not willing to give up everything for God, are you willing to be made willing?' I shall never forget the struggle through which I passed. I would have first a revelation of Christ and then another picture of myself, and at last, on the day never-to-be-forgotten, strength came to me to say, 'I am willing to be made willing.' I had only to begin the sentence when suddenly a sweet revelation of Christ, such as I never had before, came to my heart, and I am very sure that from 1892 to the present time, the Bible has been a new book, preaching has been more of a passion, and my desire to do the will of God has been most constant."

trace Methodist Church, in Richmond, Indiana, some one came one Sunday afternoon to speak to the scholars, and at the close of his address made an appeal which he desired every one who would take a stand for Christ to rise to his feet.

A Church that Holds No Fairs

IN these days of church fairs, suppers, festivals, and what not, as means of raising money for the support of religious work, it is rare to find a church which does not resort to such devices. It is even more rare to find one that has kept clear of them all through its history. The church which occupies this unique position is the St. Paul Methodist Episcopal, of Spring street, Trenton, N. J. It is organized a little more than ten years ago, and has always been supported by voluntary contributions of members. None of them are wealthy, and many are hardly in moderate circumstances. They have made it the rule of their lives, however, to give the one-tenth required in biblical times, and this, with other generous offerings, has been the means of keeping all debts paid, besides paying for the erection of the pretty little church itself, as well as for street and sewer expenses and part payment on a handsome parsonage property.

The pastor, the Rev. Percy Perinchief, is an earnest advocate of these methods which have brought temporal prosperity and spiritual blessing to his people. There is no lack of friendliness among the members. The entertainments given by the Epworth League, for purely social purposes, take the place of other schemes where the making of money is the prime object, and which are so often the means of creating dissension among church workers.

The Orinoco Mission Boat

Missionary Crichton, of the Venezuela Mission, has arrived safely at Cape Bolivar, with his little steam launch, which was specially built in this country to carry on Gospel work on the great river Orinoco. He thus writes:

"The voyage has taken more time than we anticipated, but it has brought us gradually into this hot and trying climate. The season has been a very hot one, and the rains are very late. The Orinoco River is only now beginning to rise rapidly. We heartily appreciate the interest and practical assistance of so many of your readers, and we trust that soon we shall be enabled to reach far into the interior. Our address is Cape Bolivar, Venezuela, care American Consul."

Revival at Pleasantville, Pa.

A very earnest revival work has been going on recently in the town of Pleasantville, Pa. Rev. Roger Charnock, of the Presbyterian Church, invited Rev. G. I. Stone, of Titusville, Pa., an evangelist, to hold a series of meetings in his church. Mr. Stone had charge, under Bishop Thoburn, of the Seamen's Mission in Calcutta, and was there instrumental in bringing many thousands to Christ. In the meetings in Pleasantville, many church members were received, twenty-eight souls confessed Christ, and fourteen were received into the Church at one time. Mr. Stone and his wife are engaged in a small mission in Titusville, Pa., where nightly there are heard testimonies of great helpfulness and encouragement.

TRUST HIM

TRUST him in the daylight, though the shadows fall,
Trust him in the night-watch, trust him through it all.
Never love so tender, never heart so true,
Gives you of his mercy day by day anew.
Trust him though you do not always understand,
Trust him till you meet him in the Morning Land.
Trust him while you linger, love him as you wait,
Till trusting him you enter his royal palace gate.

A Great Meeting in an Old Church

THE MORAVIAN CHURCH, WINSTON-SALEM, N. C., ERECTED IN 1800

THE old Moravian Church, a picture of which is given on this page, is a landmark of Winston-Salem, N. C. It was erected in 1800, and last year celebrated its centennial.

A notable event in its history—perhaps the most notable—was the recent convening there of the evening sessions of the Fourth Conference for Education in the South. Prof. Peabody, of Harvard University, made a graceful allusion to the fitness of the place for such deliberations, when he spoke of the Moravian idea of training children with the belief that each child was sent directly from God for the purpose of doing well some particular thing. The morning meetings were held in the chapel of Salem Academy. The Conference was a sort of love-feast of eminent thinkers of all sections. "Never before in the history of our community," writes Miss S. A. Vogler to this paper, "have we been honored by the convocation of so distinguished a body. Who can tell how far-reaching may be the influence of its deliberations?" Among those who took active part in the Conference were Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott; Bishop McVickar, of Rhode Island; Hon. J. L. M. Curry, Agent of Peabody and Slater Funds; Dr. James McAllister, President Drexel Institute, Philadelphia; Dr. Truman J. Backus, President Packer Institute, Brooklyn; Dr. Albert Shaw, Editor Review of Reviews; Dr. John Graham Brooks, Cambridge, Mass.; Hon. C. B. Gibson, Superintendent Public Schools, Columbus, Ga.; Hon. G. R. Glen, State Superintendent of Education, Georgia; Dr. Geo. T. Winston, President North Carolina Agricultural and Mechanical College; Dr. St. George Tucker, President Washington & Lee University, Virginia, and others equally representative of educational movements, North and South.

Hon. C. B. Aycock, Governor of North Carolina, delivered the address of welcome. Mr. Robert Ogden (of the firm of John Wanamaker, New York), President of the Conference, responded. Music of the first day was given by the Moravian Church Band, and the devotional exercises were conducted by the Moravian Bishop, Rt. Rev. Edward Randthaler. Hon. O. B. Eaton, Mayor of Winston, at the close of the sessions, voiced Winston-Salem's appreciation of the regard shown to her by the calling of this Conference.

"Camp Northfield"

"Camp Northfield," the famous vacation ground for young Christian workers, was opened by the late evangelist, D. L. Moody, in July, 1895, with a dozen tents, occupied by young men from New York, Brooklyn and elsewhere. The number of visitors—Y.M.C.A. members and others—has increased year by year. Last season over 400 young men tented on this ground. It is a wonderful place, in full view of the broad and beautiful Connecticut Valley and in sight of the Green and White Mountains. Swimming, boating, fishing, golf, tennis, baseball, corn-roasts and camp receptions add to the comfort and attractions of the camp. The arrangements are free from all conventionality. The camp opens on June 27 and closes September 2. Mr. A. G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., will send full information to any inquiring reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Converted in a Barn

Mrs. Caroline Foster Crippen died recently at the home of her son, G. P. Crippen, in Farmington, Pa., aged ninety-four years and six months. She was born in Saratoga County, N. Y., in 1806, and in 1816, she moved with her parents to Delaware county, where she was married to John Crippen, Jan. 21, 1824. The young couple began house-keeping on Mr. Crippen's farm in Rutland, Tioga county, Pa. In 1829, they moved to Farmington, then an almost unbroken wilderness, where Mrs. Crippen endured the hardships incident to pioneer life, and where she lived to enjoy the fruits of her labors for over seventy-one years. She was the mother of six children, three daughters and three sons. Five of these reached adult age, and four survive her. She was converted in 1837, in a series of meetings held in the barn of John A. Kemp, as there was no place of worship for miles around. She probably never thought, as she walked the long, rough road to and from that barn, that she would live to worship many years in a church built upon her own farm, and where services were held every Sunday, instead of once in four weeks, as it was then. She was an earnest, consistent Christian worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church for over sixty years, and her door was ever open to the needy and sorrowful.

GAINING BY LOSING*

Losses that Have Proved the Truest Gains in the End

HOW Christ must have been pained by the question which, as we learn from Matthew 19: 27, Peter put to him, to which the verses associated with the topic were a reply! When we think of what Christ gave up that he might come to this world to redeem men, of his infinite love, his humiliation, his life of privation and hardship, his agony in the Garden, and his death on the Cross, it is pitiful to think that he should have been asked what he would give to the man who loved him in return. How would a mother feel if her son, on whom she had lavished her love, whom she had watched in sickness and for whose comfort she had toiled and slaved, asked her what would be his reward for being dutiful to her in her old age? The wretched fellow would deserve to be deprived of the privilege of caring for her. Commercialism has so eaten into our souls in this age, that even now there are some who repeat Peter's question. Ministers sometimes descend to answer it by expatiating on the glories and felicities of heaven, and urge people to come to Christ and deny themselves in this life for the sake of what they will receive in the world to come. But it is a pitiful argument, an appeal to all that is lowest and meanest in human nature. No man becomes Christ-like by such motives. If he can hear that Christ suffered and died that he might be saved from sin, if he can realize that Christ loved him so much that he laid down his life for him, and makes no response until he is assured that all he will lose by following him will be more than made up to him in heaven, he is not worth saving. Such bargain-making is an offense in the eyes of God.

But while it is degrading to stipulate for a reward and to do a duty for the sake of what will be gained by doing it, the reward does come and men do gain by losing. Sometimes the loss is of things that are well lost, as in the case of the reformed drunkard, who, being taunted with all the pleasure he was losing by becoming a total abstainer, said: "Yes, I have lost many things by giving up the drink. I have lost a miserable home, I have lost the weeping of wife and children, I have lost my morning headaches, my debts, my bad reputation and a host of other things that I am very thankful to have lost, and I have gained lots of things well worth having." We are familiar with the principle in every walk of life. The farmer loses the seed that he puts into the soil, but it brings the gain of the harvest. The lad at school loses the pleasure he would have in the ball-field, but in losing it, he gains the education that will make him a useful and successful man. The young man may lose the enjoyment of a club or a picnic or evenings spent in pleasure, but he may be gaining the means of getting a home of his own. There are employees who have lost their position by refusing to lie and have found in that very loss the beginning of a life of prosperity. Quite recently a merchant related how he lost the sale of an article by telling his customer of a defect in it, but he thereby gained the confidence of his customer, which proved the beginning of a new era in his business. It does not always pay in a commercial sense to do right. No man should depend on getting his reward in dollars; he should do right because it is right, whatsoever his loss may be; but there are sufficient instances of gain coming from it to encourage him. He will at least gain the approval of his conscience, and the satisfaction of having done his duty, which is no mean reward.

Christ said: "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." The paradox has been proved true by millions. Men have given up property and position and all that in the opinion of the world makes life worth living, and have found in the love of Christ and the unfathomable peace that he gives, a happiness that the world knows nothing of. The story told of a man on a sinking ship, who loaded himself with the gold that he was bringing from the mines that he sank, lost his life, while his companion took the belt in which his gold was carried and swam out to safety. It has been so again and again in the affairs of life. Eternal life has been lost in the effort to save a fortune, principles have been sacrificed, lies told and crimes committed, and at the end, whether the man was successful or not, he has counted himself a fool. On the other hand, the loss of fortune and ease and comfort has been many the beginning of eternal life. David said, they have found that it is a good thing for them that they were afflicted, for when stripped of their possessions they turned to God and learned to trust in him. That these losses may be painful, none will deny. Christ compels some of them to the loss of a right hand or a right eye, but happy is the man who has the courage to renounce. When he finds that some possession, or some ambition or occupation is endangering the safety of his soul, he alone is wise who resolutely puts them away from him, sacrificing them at any cost rather than in the risk of being dragged down by them to the abode of the lost.

The Best of all Testaments

Allow me to thank you for the premiums of the Red-Letter Testaments. I am more than pleased with them. One, I gave to a non-religious traveling man, with a request that he make it his daily companion. One of the HERALDS goes into a religious family, where there are two sons (sixteen and eighteen), and my prayer is that they heed of its teachings. C. L. HARRISON, Glenwood, Fla.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

KEEP COOL.

From Proper Hot Weather Food.

People can live in a temperature which feels from ten to twenty degrees cooler than their neighbors enjoy, by regulating the breakfast. The plan is to avoid meat entirely for breakfast; use a goodly allowance of fruit, either cooked or raw. Then follow with a saucer containing about four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, treated with a little rich cream. Add to this about two slices of entire wheat bread, with a meager amount of butter, and serve one cup of Postum Food Coffee.

If one prefers, the Grape-Nuts can be turned into the cup of Food Coffee, giving a delightful combination. By this selection of food the bodily energy is preserved, while the hot, carbonaceous foods have been left out. The result is a very marked difference in the temperature of the body, and to this comfortable condition is added the certainty of easy and perfect digestion, for the food is readily worked up by the digestive machinery.

Experience and experiment in food and its application to the human body has brought out these facts. They can be made use of and add materially to the comfort of the user.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Power of Habit*

"F having been once defeated, thou shalt say, 'The next time I will conquer'; and then the same thing over again, be sure that in the end thou wilt be brought to such a sorry and feeble state that henceforth thou wilt not so much as know that thou art sinning; but thou wilt begin to make excuses for everything, and then confirm that saying of the Lord to be true:

"With ill unending strives the putter-off." —EPICETUS.

Francis Bacon said: "A man's nature is either to herbs or weeds; therefore, let him seasonably water the one and destroy the other." A large portion of our lives represents habits. This is not necessarily an evil; indeed, the establishment of habitual action is indispensable to intelligent existence. But the word "habit," as ordinarily understood, signifies fixed tendencies to action, either physical or mental, which are injurious, or foolish or morally wrong. As the great factor in the formation of all habits is repetition continued until attention is not required, the repeated assault of the will directed by keenest attention and governed by desire until the fixed tendency is overcome, seems to be the only method of rooting out these obnoxious weeds of body and mind. A strong will can master most habits at once, if the man genuinely desires that this be done. A continued effort to destroy evil habits must develop itself. But this effort supposes conflicting desires or impulses—those running to the habit, and those opposing it. Hence the value of mental culture, and especially of strength of memory, imagination and will in order that the conflict may be made to turn in the right direction.

To overcome habits, then, one must bring his entire attention to the matter; must think intensely of the motives and outcomes involved, and must resolve to do all things necessary to turn the mind away from habit toward freedom. We must that we resolve; yet perhaps no resolution has really risen in the mind. In time of great sorrow, or of extreme excitement or pleasure, or of intense anger or disgust with self, or of fear of results, we relieve ourselves so deeply cut into the soul that it has opportunity to discover its ability to perform and to suffer, and to become habituated a little to the necessary discomfort of self-denial, and so to take a new hold by will for a more persistent effort. By this time the "force of habit" at the test of continuance have become slightly less, while the power of will has correspondingly grown. Perseverance is the sure prophet of reward.

It is a law, probably, that as much will-power must be expended in curing a habit as has been employed in acquiring it, therefore the matter may be summed up in one word: All evil habits may be destroyed by the man who really desires to master them.

Future in China for Missionaries†

NOT only will there be a new material China, but there will also be a regenerated China. A purely materialistic China, well-equipped with ironclads and Mauser rifles, and no ascendancy of moral force, would be a curse to herself and a menace to mankind. China has something far better in store for humanity. By a regenerate China is not meant that all China will be converted; but from it as yet; but it is meant that from China and the Boxers, by Rev. Charles B. Jones, editor of China Messenger and pastor of a church in China. A short history of the Boxer outbreak, with two chapters on the sufferings of missionaries and a few words about the outlook for Christian work among the "yellow" people. Pp. 11. Cloth, 60 cents; paper, 30 cents. Published by E. E. Munson, Bible House, New York.

Christianity will soon move with gigantic strides.

Drawbacks and checks there will be; but, allowing for them all, after taking into account the nature of the Chinese people, once emancipated from their slavish allegiance to their literary class, considering that they have no Indian caste to keep them back, counting as we do on the mighty power of God to be provident in the last days, now just ahead of us, we are safe in assuming that there will be such gatherings as the world has never seen. We had a little forerunner of this two years ago, when the famous reform edicts of the Emperor came out. Immediately missionary work grew immensely interesting, and many who had been secretly serving Christ came out and openly accepted him. The oppression of the gentry and officials became less and less, until the Emperor was dethroned, and then the cloud settled down once more. The foreigner's power has been felt, and will in the future be respected. This, in turn, will have the effect of causing the Chinese to respect the foreigner and his teaching, and we feel sure missionaries will not need to work so hard to get people into the Church as to keep them out, for the Chinaman, like the Westerner, desires to be connected with those who are in high favor. Teachers in English will be in demand everywhere, as the English language is the preferred one by the Chinese.

The missionaries who have retired for a time, will go back refreshed in body and spirit, and, therefore, prepared for the great work which will be crowded upon them. New churches and homes will have to be built to take the place of those destroyed, and the friends, therefore, at home will have to stand behind their respective boards, both in prayer and financial aid, to help tide over this time of severe strain. The promise of Isaiah that they shall come from the land of Sinim (China) will surely come true, for God's word cannot fail. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. The light is breaking over China to-day. God's servants should not be slow in claiming all the land. The doors of iron and brass are now creaking on their rusty hinges, and the missionary must not be discouraged, but enter in.

Separation and Consecration

The Discipline by which Abraham was Prepared for his Mission

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ONE wrong step of a man of faith may have serious and evil consequences for others. God, indeed, forgives the failures of his people, but the consequences of our failures upon others remain to remind us of our sin, and of our constant need of dependence upon him. Neither Sarai nor Lot had the manifestation of God to them personally, as Abram had. Their faith in God took its rise in his; and what he did, and how far he trusted, naturally affected their walk and their faith. Abram had gained in riches while in Egypt; but all he gained was at the sacrifice of truth. Pharaoh "entreated Abram well," for his wife's sake, who "was taken into Pharaoh's house," and he had sheep, and oxen, and he-asses, and men servants, and maid servants, and she-asses, and camels" (Gen. 12:16). The very man who had left all in Mesopotamia at the call of God, accepted riches at the hand of Pharaoh, by prevaricating about his wife, and placing her in terrible danger!

The promise of God to Abraham (Gen. 12:2), was suspended during his sojourn in Egypt; he was neither blest, nor made a blessing; and his name, instead of being made great, was under reproach. By the orders of the king, the man of God was conducted to the frontier of his land. "Pharaoh gave men charge concerning him; and they brought him on his way, and his wife, and all that he had."

And Abram went out of Egypt. A dark chapter in his life had closed. Sarai and Lot were with him, and all his riches, "cattle, silver and gold." But he was no richer in the knowledge of God, and he had left no memorial of his God in Egypt. But he did the very best thing he could in retracing his steps to the very place where he had last built an altar to the Lord (Gen. 13:1-4). Whenever a child of God gets wrong in his soul, let him seek God again where he last met with him. God changes not (Mal. 3:6); and he is ever to be found again just where we left him. But let man come back with a deeper knowledge of the corruption of his own heart. When Abram had found the altar which he had left when he took matters into his own hands, he began to do what he must have ceased to do when in Egypt, he "called on the name of the Lord" (verse 4). We may make formal prayers when we are not walking in step with God, but there can be no real communion, no calling on the name, the character and authority of Jehovah, no appeal to him on the ground of who he is and what he is when we are active in unbelief.

Lot had profited from his uncle's prosperity in Egypt; he had an eye to business as regards earthly things, and probably he felt quite at home in Egypt; he also "had flocks and herds and tents." Tests there must be in the life of every true child of God, and, above all, in the lives of those who are specially called, as Abram was. "The land was not able to bear them that they might dwell together; the grass was exhausted, the brooks began to run dry. A strife arose between the herdmen belonging to Abram and those belonging to Lot; the uncle and nephew began to have divided interests.

"Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we are brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me; if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or, if thou take the right hand, then I will go to the left" (verses 8, 9 R.V.). So "Lot lifted up his eyes," but no higher than earth. He did not lift up his eyes to the Lord to ask his will in the choice he should make; he did not consider how unseemly it was for him, a young man, to take advantage of the disinterestedness of his uncle. He saw the chance to do a good stroke of business. Seeing "all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, . . . like the garden of the Lord," he chose the best for himself.

Now Abram was fully separated from his country, his kindred, and his father's house. "And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes." Lot had lifted up his eyes to look out the best for himself. "Lift up now thine eyes, to see what I have reserved for thee. And look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." Self-interest can only procure what is limited, and the tenure of which is uncertain. But they who rely upon the Lord discover the deep truth of those words, "All things are yours" (1 Cor. 3:21), and "all things are for your sakes" (11 Cor. 4:15). "We come into the possession of everything which we renounce for God. The very plain of Jordan, which the covetous Lot had secured, would own him only for a temporary tenant; it was secured by eternal title deeds to Abraham and to his seed forever.

And this was not all. "I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered." And it is not only what thou now seest. "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for I will give it thee." The seed of Abraham shall yet possess the land, and it shall yet be too straight for the number of the inhabitants. Within the last two hundred years the Jews have increased fourfold, and their increase within the last fifty years is considerably more than this ratio; for the time is at hand when the promises to Israel, which fill the Old Testament, shall be literally fulfilled.

May we not learn from this history the foolishness as well as the sinfulness of self-seeking? We are born again that we may be witnesses of the living God, that others may see, as Lot saw, when he parted from Abram, that a man who sees God and knows Him does not count it a risk to trust his earthly interests to God. He can count upon his unseen God, who really loves and cares for him. If we really believe that he is caring for us moment by moment, we are not anxious, we are kept in peace. Anxiety is a proof that we do not trust, that we have misgivings about the love and faithfulness of God. Really, everything that is permitted to happen to us is arranged for the day and hour, as the very best thing that can be. God is in everything, and he makes no mistakes. Let us only take him at his word, then we shall glorify him and find how really all things, the most trying and difficult, are for our sakes. Ours is a good portion—Abraham's portion, when we have Abraham's faith.

HARD TO BREAK.

But the Coffee Habit can be Put Off.

"I was a coffee user from early childhood but it finally made me so nervous that I spent a great many sleepless nights, starting at every sound I heard and suffering with a continual dull headache. My hands trembled and I was also troubled with shortness of breath and palpitation of the heart. The whole system showed a poisoned condition and I was told to leave off coffee, for that was the cause of it. I was unable to break myself of the habit until some one induced me to try Postum Food Coffee.

The first trial, the Food Coffee was flat and tasteless and I thought it was horrid stuff, but my friend urged me to try again and let it boil longer. This time I had a very delightful beverage and have been enjoying it ever since, and am now in a very greatly improved condition of health.

My brother is also using Postum instead of coffee and a friend of ours, Mr. W., who was a great coffee user, found himself growing more and more nervous and was troubled at times with dizzy spells. His wife suffered with nausea and indigestion, also from coffee. They left it off and have been using Postum Food Coffee for some time and are now in a perfect condition of health." Grace C. Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Aug. 28

1. Had a friend and an enemy were both in danger simultaneously, and I am duty bound to aid my enemy first, or should I yield to the promptings of my heart and succor my friend?
2. Is the world growing better or worse? Briefly, what are the facts in evidence?
3. Was David justified in ordering Solomon to have Joab and Shimei executed (1 Kings 2:59)?
4. When, where, and under what circumstances was glass discovered or invented?
5. Is the practice of condoning immorality in men justifiable? That is to say, should the male offender be ostracized by those who know him, as severely as they ostracize offenders of the other sex?

Questions of the Week

1. An aged friend, long past the "allotted span," asks: "Is it selfish to desire heaven? Is my contemplation of the joys of heaven tinged with selfishness?" What is the answer?

The desire to reach heaven or perfect felicity, is one natural to the human soul, and is good in the highest degree, for it implies a desire for the highest purity and virtue. It desires nothing at the expense of any other. Especially is it unselfish, for one who has lived out the best of his days upon this earth, to wish to go there, for he can, through the infirmity of nature, be of little service to his Master or his fellow-creatures here, while by going thither he is assured of an eternity of activity in well-doing. L. T. RIGHTSSELL.

No! Paul, who "counted not his life dear unto himself," who could even "wish himself accursed from Christ for the sake of his brethren," yet had a "desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is much better" (Phil. 23). The old Hebrew saints desired a better country, which is "an heavenly." It is not selfishness for the tired child to cry for mother, or for the lonely exile to long for home, nor for the storm-tossed mariner to desire a haven of rest. So, when the aged pilgrim desires heaven it is not selfish, but rather the immortal spirit so long confined within the earthly house seeking her native place in the paradise of God. WM. J. LUSCOMBE.

The Spirit's ministry is to show us the things of heaven. God loves us, and he is anxious to have us with him. The desire to go to heaven to be with Jesus is not selfish at any age, but to fret and worry, because of any delay, would be sinful. Christ told us to watch and pray for his coming. Desire always precedes prayer and watchfulness. PHILIP BAUER.

Heaven is where Christ is, and I cannot conceive of a sweeter or more unselfish joy than the desire of the disciple to be in heaven with the Master, "his dwelling place." The great apostle to the Gentiles was not under condemnation for desiring to depart. His desire was heaven-born—not carnal, but spiritual. I know of no Scriptural admonition against the saints contemplating the joys of heaven, but in language of surpassing beauty and sublimity, the Word of God ever brings before us the glories of Zion. Why should we not look forward with rapturous delight to the hour when "our eyes shall see the King in his beauty?" Our answer, in the light of God's Word, is that it is not selfish to desire heaven. A. A. KNIGHT.

When one's life work is so nearly ended, although living friends are dearly loved, and the days spent with them are enjoyable ones; it would be natural to desire the greater joys which are promised. LYDIA WARD.

There are two ways in which to look forward to the life beyond, one sinful the other the reverse. I think that our aged friend has chosen the latter. It is a privilege the aged have to look forward to the home beyond the river, where infirmities are unknown. MRS. F. P. WILLIAMS.

I should decidedly say, No! Jesus points to heaven as the believer's goal—"I go to prepare a place for you." A child of God who has passed through many conflicts and infirmities of age, may and does naturally long for the rest remaining for his chosen ones. To desire to be with her Saviour cannot be wrong.

I have wrestled on toward heaven
'Gainst wind and storm and tide,
Now like a weary traveler
That leaneth on his guide.
Amid the shades of evening,
While sinks life's lingering sand,
I hail the glory dawning
From Immanuel's land.

ISALINE V. WRIGHT.

For this aged friend, nearing the celestial gates, it surely cannot be selfish to be largely occupied with ardent anticipation of, and desire for, the heavenly home. As we draw near to the end of the journey, and get but she did not let this longing keep her from faithful service. She had seen her large family of sons and daughters grow into useful Christian men and women, and had stood by her husband while he joyfully entered the river of death, and then felt that it was no longer for her to plan for the future, but lovingly and patiently wait for the blessed summons "to come up higher."

2. If a hive of bees swarm on Sunday, would the bee-keeper be justified in hiving them as a work of necessity, or should he let them go, knowing that by so doing he will lose them?

He should hive them, and for the same reason that he would pull the sheep or the ox out of the "pit," or milk the cow—because it is necessary work—could not be done before or be put off until the next day. But the bee-keeper should try to prevent Sunday swarming as much as possible, and he need have very little hiving to do. By giving the bees plenty of room the last of the week to store surplus, by cutting out queen cells, or dividing the colonies that are ready to swarm, or putting a cage over the entrance, very few colonies will swarm on Sunday. But if they be held of first importance, the acquirement of knowledge secondary. H. L. TAYLOR

4. What great reformer died saying he was weary of the world?

The phrase has been attributed to Melancthon, Luther's associate, but it is not authentic. It is hardly the sort of expression dying Christian would be likely to use, since it expresses a feeling of hopelessness as well as weariness. Cardinal Wolsey, in the famous soliloquy, employs the expressive "Weary and old with service . . . V. pomp and glory of this world, I hate ye!" L. BARRETT

5. Is a minister justified in accepting a call at a larger salary, if he is in no special need of the increase, when he knows that he is doing valuable work in his present field, and that it might be difficult to fill his place with a successor?

If an ambassador of the United States to a foreign court should decide questions of office with an eye to his own financial benefit instead of the interest of the government he represents, he would be considered unworthy. But the minister of Christ who decides upon a place of work from financial consideration—more so. He should seek the place where he can best serve the interests of the kingdom of heaven, leaving the question of salary to him who said "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." Especially is that so when the great majority of our friends are in that world already, and are waiting to greet us on the other shore. Such duties ought to be performed with all kindness and sympathy until life's close.

3. What is the greatest defect in child-training to-day?

The greatest defect in child-training to-day, is that so little effort is made to cultivate and develop the moral nature, and that children are so seldom taught, according to their capacity, to reason and be reasonable. It is easier to say "you must and you shall," but the child should be so taught that it will suffice to say rather "you ought and you will." One of the first lessons the little one learns should be the Golden Rule, and it should be hung on the walls of the home and the school, and be constantly referred to as the test and measure of its action everywhere. The State takes the education of its children in hand at an early age, but concerns itself only with the training of the intellect. Its mistake is that so much is demanded along that line, that the children have little or no opportunity, even out of school hours, in taking part in the social and industrial life of the home. They should learn to lift their share of its burdens, do their part of its work, and appreciate to some extent the cares and perplexities of their elders. Nor ought they to be left without the skill that practice gives in the use of the hands. The formation of character should

HIS LITTLE BROWN MAID

BY MARY C. FRANCIS

SOMEWHERE in the mad flight that Amalgamated Copper made between 64 and 126 during the last Wall street boom, Dudley Wayne, broker, club man and all-round good fellow, cleared up $100,000. He had not been labor man before, now he felt that he had a fair beginning in the race for wealth, at it was with this comfortable sensation fresh on him that he sat with his friend, Gregory Wilson, in the luxurious library of the latter in his Fifth avenue home. "You have a big start on me, Gregory," he said, laughing, "but I may catch up with you yet, old man. A few more favorable deals and I may be a millionaire also."

"I hope so, Dudley; I don't know of anyone who deserves it better," replied his friend, genially. "In the meantime I take it you won't wait till you are a millionaire to begin to enjoy yourself."

The microbe of wealth has bitten deeply into stronger men than Dudley Wayne, at just now his system was fully inoculated with that subtle virus. He was in that generous and expansive mood which precedes the fatal contraction of the heart and the purse strings, and that $100,000 beckoned him on toward the financial horizon where $1,000,000 danced like the Northern Lights. He leaned back in the deep chair with careless grace. "Oh, of course, I shall enjoy myself," he said nonchalantly, "but after all, I am comparatively a poor man. My bank account has to be picked up in seven figures to live with elegance in this city. My little pile doesn't count. I was wondering to-day what I could do with so small an amount of money, I can anything that would bring me real happiness."

Before Gregory could answer, the door opened softly and a little girl entered with a shy and half appealing look. She was a beautiful child of about nine, with hazel eyes, curling bronze hair and a rose tint in her fair cheeks. At seeing a stranger, she swung on the door knob and hesitated.

"Come in, Evelyn," called her father. "This is Mr. Wayne, dear." The child shook hands with Dudley and blushing showed a photograph down by her side.

"What's this?" asked Wayne, by way of opening conversation, "is that your picture? Let me see it."

Her timidity vanished instantly. "Oh, that's a picture of my little orphan," she said, eagerly, and before his astonished eyes she laid a photograph of a forlorn, dark-eyed, dark-skinned little girl, as thoroughly Oriental as she was Anglo-Saxon.

"Your what?" said Dudley, utterly at sea. After the manner of children when their confidence is once gained Evelyn's tongue was now loosed, and in childish phrases she told him a simple story that lifted a corner of the dark veil of the Orient for one who had never looked behind it.

Why, there was a dreadful famine in India, and there wasn't a rain, and all the people were dying, and, oh! so many little children starved to death. And after a while our missionaries established the missions, and in all the children they could find that hadn't died, and now they take care of them and educate them and are very good to them. I wanted to take care of an orphan for a whole year, and I saved up my money for a long time and got an orphan, and this is her picture." She finished with such an air of pride as a mother might expect over her first-born. She went on: "This is the way they all look before they go to the mission." She took from the table a large group photograph and showed it to him, while she talked on her favorite theme. Dudley looked at the picture—the famine-stricken children, vacant eyes in hollow faces, the parchment skin drawn tightly over the protruding cheek-bones, skeleton arms and legs, swollen stomachs. Their eyes that unearthly light that marks the uncanny border-land between this world and the next.

Already they looked like food for vultures.

"And this is the way they look after they have been in the mission for awhile," she went on. "This is Panna, my little orphan. See how pretty she is now, at least, here she is in the group." With her forefinger she pointed to one of the tiny human skeletons, a creature whose bones were partly covered with a few rags, the stomach unnaturally bloated from starvation, the eyes dull caverns, the mouth open, death so plainly stamped that one wondered where the spark of life could find lodgment. Wayne looked from one picture to the other with a strange feeling curling around tendrils of his nature that he had not even suspected before. A sixth sense vibrated somewhere, and through long unused spiritual avenues there flowed vague but inspiring emotions. Imagination was not dead in him, and as he looked at the lovely, smiling child, plump and rosy with health, who now leaned confidently against his knee, it flashed through his mind that famine would do for her what it had done for these pictured skeletons. The idea sent a chill to his heart. Involuntarily he drew her to him and kissed her, the first time he had kissed a child in over twenty years. She looked up at him with perfect confidence and said: "Wouldn't you like to have a little orphan, too?" A dark flush spread over Wayne's face.

"Why, I—I—my dear, I"—He stopped.

The self-possessed man of the world was puzzled. He gave an appealing look at Gregory, but that individual smiled calmly and said nothing to help him out. Evelyn went on:

"It will only cost you $15, and then you can have your own little orphan—all your own. Oh, it's just lovely! I couldn't do without Panna!"

"I must certainly have an orphan," he said. He wrote the check and handed it to her.

"Oh, Mr. Wayne," she cried, "I'll have the teacher get you the prettiest little orphan you ever saw; but she can't be prettier than my Panna."

"She could at least not be prettier than Panna's patron," said Wayne. "Good-night, Evelyn. I hold you responsible for my orphan."

Dudley Wayne went back to Wall street, and in the fluctuations of the stock market speedily forgot the check he had written for some gaunt little orphan in far-off India. The tape rolling out from the ticker told of other matters than the famine-haunted of India, and in the rise and fall of the market the life of "the street" resumed its dominating sway.

But, while he forgot, the agency he had invoked did its work, and while copper soared, and coffee sank, and wheat rose and fell, a message was sent and returned to that distant land, and one more little starveling was rescued. So it came to pass that, many weeks later, there came to him in the morning mail a letter, saying that his aid had been received and was duly acknowledged with sincere thanks; that a child, a little girl, had been chosen as his ward, and that in due time reports would be made of her progress. Wayne read the letter with curious interest as messengers hurried hither and thither, and anxious customers waited in the outer room. Then, he pigeon-holed it, and was half conscious of a pleasurable though only partly acknowledged interest away down in his heart. That evening he called on Gregory, and laughingly told of the letter and jested with Evelyn about it, but to his companions on the stock market he said nothing. He decided that they would not properly appreciate it.

Again the weeks rolled on; indeed, they had passed into months since the check was written, and once more Dudley had all but forgotten. Then came a day that was ever after marked with a red star on his calendar. Lying among telegrams, cablegrams and a pile of mail, lay one peculiar missive, a square packet, addressed in a round, unformed hand, the letters half printed, half written, the postmark Allahabad, India. He tore it open, remembering all in an instant. Out from it fell the photograph of a child, of perhaps ten years of age, a sweet, intelligent face, with that expression of tenderness and mystery that frequently stamps the women of the East, a mobile mouth, great clusters of rich dark hair falling over her shoulders, and all the beauty of the face lit up by glorious eyes that looked straight into his with pathos and confidence. A veritable breath of romance from that cradle

SECRET SOCIETIES

TEXT -- Prov. 25 : 9 :

Discover not a secret to another

IT appears that in Solomon's time, as in all subsequent periods of the world, there were people too much disposed to tell all they knew. It was blab, blab, blab; physicians revealing the case of their patients, lawyers exposing the private affairs of their clients, neighbors advertising the faults of the next-door resident; pretended friends betraying confidences.

One half of the trouble of every community comes from the fact that so many people have not capacity to keep their mouths shut. When I hear something disparaging of you, my first duty is not to tell you. But if I tell you what somebody has said against you, and then go out and tell everybody else what I told you, and they go out and tell others what I told them that I told you, and we all go out, some to hunt up the originator of the story and others to hunt it down, we shall get the whole community talking about what you did do and what you did not do, and there will be as many scalps taken as though a band of Modocs had swept upon a helpless village. We have two ears but only one tongue. A physiological suggestion that we ought to hear a good deal more than we tell. Let us join a conspiracy that we will tell each other all the good and nothing of the ill, and then there will not be such awful need of sermons on Solomon's words, "Discover not a secret to another."

Solomon had a very large domestic circle. In his earlier days he had very confused notions about monogamy and polygamy, and his multitudinous associates in the matrimonial state kept him too well informed as to what was going on in Jerusalem. They gathered up all the privacies and poured them into his ear, and his family became a sorosis or female debating society of seven hundred, discussing day after day all the difficulties between husbands and wives, between employers and employees, between rulers and subjects, until Solomon, in my text, deplores volubility about affairs that do not belong to us, and extols the virtue of secretiveness.

How Homes are Wrecked

By the power of a secret divulged, families, churches, neighborhoods, nations, fly apart. By the power of a secret kept, great charities, reformatory movements, and Christian enterprises may be advanced. Men are gregarious—cattle in herds, birds in flocks, men in social circles. You sometimes see a man with no out-branchings of sympathy. His nature is cold and hard, like a ship's mast ice-glazed, which the most agile sailor could never climb. Others have a thousand roots and a thousand branches. Innumerable tendrils climb their hearts, and blossom all the way up, and the fowls of heaven sing in the branches. In consequence of this tendency we find men coming together in tribes, in communities, in churches, in societies. Some gather together to cultivate the arts, some to plan for the welfare of the State, some to discuss religious themes, some to kindle their mirth, some to advance their craft. So every active community is divided into associations, of artists, of merchants, of bookbinders, of carpenters, of masons, of plasterers, of shipwrights, of plumbers. Do you cry out against it? Then you cry out against a tendency divinely implanted. Your tirades would accomplish no more than if you should preach to a busy ant-hill a long sermon against secret societies.

Here we find the oft-discussed question whether associations that do their work with closed doors, and admit their members by pass-words, and greet each other with a secret grip, are right or wrong. I answer that it depends entirely on the nature of the object for which they meet. Is it to pass the hours in revelry, wassail, blasphemy, and obscene talk, or to plot trouble to the State, or to debauch the innocent, then I say with an emphasis that no man can mistake, No! But is the object the defense of the rights of any class against oppression, the improvement of the mind, the enlargement of the heart, the advancement of art, the defense of the Government, the extirpation of crime, or the kindling of a pure-hearted sociality, then I say, with just as much emphasis, Yes.

There is no need that we who plan for the conquest of right over wrong should publish to all the world our intentions. The general of an army never sends to the opposing troops information of the coming attack. Shall we who have enlisted in the cause of God and humanity expose our plans to the enemy? No! we will in secret plot the ruin of all the enterprises of Satan and his cohorts. When they expect us by day, we will fall upon them by night. While they are strengthening their left wing, we will fall on their right. By a plan of battle formed in secret conclave, we will come suddenly upon them crying, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Secrecy of plot and execution are wrong only when the object and ends are nefarious. Every family is a secret society, every business firm, and every banking and insurance institution. Those men who have no capacity to keep a secret are unfit for positions of trust anywhere. There are thousands of men whose vital need is culturing a capacity to keep a secret. Men talk too much, and women too. There is a time to keep silence as well as a time to speak.

Some Associations Praiseworthy

Although not belonging to any of the great secret societies about which there has been so much violent discussion, I have only words of praise for those associations which have for their object the maintenance of right against wrong, or the reclamation of inebriates, or, like the score of mutual benefit societies called by different names, that provide temporary relief for widows and orphans, and for men incapacitated by sickness or accident from earning a livelihood.

There are secret societies in our colleges that have, letters of the Greek alphabet for their nomenclature, and their members are at the very front in scholarship and irreproachable in morals, while there are others the scene of carousal, and they gamble, and they drink, and they graduate knowing a hundred times more about sin than they do of geometry and Sophocles. In other words, secret societies, like individuals, are good or bad, are the means of moral health or of temporal and eternal damnation. All good people recognize the vice of slandering an individual, but many do not see the sin of slandering an organization. There are old secret societies in this and other countries, some of them centuries old, which have been widely denounced as immoral and damaging in their influence; yet I have hundreds of personal friends who belong to them, friends who are consecrated to God, pillars in the church, faithful in all relations of life, examples of virtue and piety.

One of these secret societies gave for the relief of the sick one year, in this country, $1,490,274. Some of these societies have poured a very heaven of sunshine and benediction into the home of suffering. Several of them are founded on fidelity to good citizenship and the Bible. I have never taken one of their degrees. They might give me the grip a thousand times, and I would not recognize it. I am ignorant of their pass-words, and I must judge entirely from the outside. But Christ has given us a rule by which we may judge not only all individuals, but all societies, secret and open. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Bad societies make bad men. Good societies make good men. A bad man will not stay in a good society. A good man will not stay in a bad society. Then try all secret societies by two or three rules.

Tests to be Applied

Test the first: Their influence on home, if you have a home. That wife soon loses her influence over her husband who nervously and foolishly looks upon all evening absence as an assault on domesticity. How are the great enterprises of reform, and art, and literature, and beneficence, and public weal to be carried on, if every man is to have his world bounded on one side by his front doorstep, and on the other side by his back window, knowing nothing higher than his own attic or lower than his own cellar? That wife who becomes jealous of her husband's attention to art, or literature, or religion, or charity, is breaking her own sceptre of conjugal power. I know an instance where a wife thought that her husband was giving too many nights to Christian service, to charitable service, to prayer meetings, and to religious convocation. She systematically decoyed him away, until now he attends no church, waits upon no charitable institution, and is on a rapid way to destruction, his morals gone, his money gone, and I fear, his soul gone. Let any Christian wife rejoice when her husband consecrates evenings to the service of humanity, and of God, or anything elevating. But let no man sacrifice home life to secret society life, as many do. I can point out to you a great many names of men who are guilty of this sacrilege. They are as genial as angels at the society room, and as ugly as sin at home. They are generous on all subjects of wine suppers, yachts and fast horses, but they are stingy about the wives' dresses and the children's shoes. That man has made that which might be a healthful influence, a usurper of his affections, and he has married it, and he is guilty of moral bigamy. Under this process the wife, whatever her features, becomes uninteresting and homely. He becomes critical of her, does not like the dress, does not like the way she arranges her hair, is amazed that he ever was so unromantic as to offer her hand and heart. There are secret societies where membership always involves domestic shipwreck. Tell me that a man has joined a certain kind, and tell me nothing more about him for ten years, and I will write his history if he be still alive. The man is a guzzler, his wife broken-hearted or prematurely old, his fortune gone, and his home a mere name in the directory.

Another test by which you can find whether a secret society is right or wrong is the effect it has on your secular occupation. I can understand through such an institution a man can reach commercial success. I know some men have formed the business relations through such a channel. The secret society has advantaged you in an honorable way, all right. But has your credit failed? Are you a bargain-maker now more anxious how they trade with a bale of goods? Have the men whose names were down in the commercial agency A-1 before they entered the society, been going down since in commercial standing? Then look out. You and I every day know of commercial establishments going to ruin through the social excesses of one or two members, their fortune beaten to death with ball-player's cut amidships with the front prow of the regatta, going down under the swift hoofs of the fast horse, or drowned in the large potatoes of cognac or Monaghan. That secret society was the Loch Earn. Their business was the Ville de Havre. They struck, and the Ville de Havre went under!

Moral or Religious Tests

The third test by which you may know whether the society to which you belong is good or bad is this: What is its effect on your sense of moral and religious obligation? Now, if I should take the names of the people in this audience, and put them on a roll, and then I should lay that roll back of this organ, and a hundred years from now some one should take the roll and call it from A to Z there would not one of you answer. I say that any society that makes me forget my fact is a bad society.

Which would you rather have in your hand when you come to die—a pack of cards or a Bible? Which would you rather have pressed to your lips in the coming moment—the cup of Belshazzarean wassail or the chalice of Christian communion? Whom would you rather have for your pall-bearers—the elders of a Christian church or the companions whose conversation was full of slang and innuendo? Whom would you rather have for your eternal companions—those men who spend their evenings betting, gambling, swinging, carousing, and telling vile stories, or your little child, that bright girl whom the Lord took? Oh, you would not have been away so much nights, would you, you had known she was going away so soon? De me, your house has never been the same place since. Our wife has never brightened up, she has never got on it. She never will get over it. You can never drown the grief in the wine-cup. You can never break away from the little arms that used to be flung around your neck when she used to say: "Papa, do stay with me to-night—do stay with me to-night." You will never be able to tip away from your lips the dying kiss of your little girl.

A Rope to the Shipwrecked

Oh, man astray, God help you! I am going to take a very stout rope. You know that sometimes a peemaker will take very small threads and wind them together, until after a while they become a ship cable. And I am going to take some very small, delicate threads and wind them together until they make a very stout rope. I will take all the memories of the marriage day—a thread of laughter, a thread of light, a thread of music, a thread of banqueting, a thread of congratulation, and I twist them together and I have one strand. Then I take a thread of the hour of the first advent in your house, a thread of the darkness that preceded and a thread of the light that followed; and a thread of the beautiful scarf that little child used to wear when she bounded out at eventide to greet you; and then a thread of the beautiful dress in which you laid her away for the resurrection; and then I twist all these threads together and I have another strand. Then I take a thread of the scarlet robe of a suffering Christ, and a thread of the white raiment of your loved ones before the throne, and a string of the harp cherubim, and a string of the harp seraphim, and I twist them all together, and I have a third strand. "Oh," you say, "this strand is enough to hold fast a world!" No; will take these strands and I will twist them together into one end of that rope I will fasten, not to the comm table, for it shall be removed; not to a pillar of the organ, for that will crumble in the ages; but I will fasten it round and round the cross of a sympathizing Christ, and having fastened one end of the rope to the cross, I throw the other end to you. Lay hold of it! Pull for your life! Pull for heaven!

OCEAN GROVE'S WORSHIPING HOST

JPON the spot now called Thompson Park at Ocean Grove, a number of consecrated Christians knelt in earnest prayer, many years ago, in Mr. Joseph H. Thornley's tent, asking for Divine direction in purchasing the grounds, that were to be devoted to sacred uses. The company was composed of many who have since entered through the everlasting gates into the city of Life. The sainted Alfred Cookman, Elif F. Lawrence, Adam Wallace, William Osburne, A. S. Ballard, Ichabod Simmons, Benjamin Adams, Joseph H. Thornley, E. H. Stokes—all wise, with insight into the needs of the Methodist Episcopal Church for a consecrated camp ground, were among the originators of the plan to provide a place where God could be worshiped and honored without the introduction of a worldly element or money-making projects. This beautiful city by the sea has now become a lighthouse, seen of all the world.

MARY BARTON COOKMAN

The present season at Ocean Grove has opened under the most favorable auspices. Even as early as June 23d, there were thousands present to hear the first Sabbath sermon by Dr. Louis Albert Banks, of New York City. Rev. Dr. C. Milard preached on June 30th, and the President, Bishop Fitzgerald, delivered the Auditorium sermon July 7th. The great oration given on July 4th, "Our National Anniversary," by the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, was a memorable occasion at the Grove—to thousand persons comprising the assemblage which filled the Auditorium.

From June 23d, meetings have been held daily in the Young People's Temple, presided over by Evangelist Charles H. Yatman, and also in the Bishop James Memorial Tabernacle, by Mrs. Lizzie R. Smith, a worthy successor of the late devoted Mrs. Sarah Lankford Palmer. These meetings are held every morning during the entire season. An active Sunday School Assembly, on the Chautauqua plan, has been in progress under the superintendence of Dr. B. B. Loomis. Following this comes a series of anniversaries, including the W.C.T.U., the Woman's Home, and Foreign Missionary Societies, and a Summer School of Theology, before the great Annual Camp Meeting which opens August 17th.

It is no unusual thing, in any of these meetings, to hear voices from India, China, Africa, and other foreign fields of evangelistic toil. The Society of "King's Daughters" had a bright day of reunion, Saturday, July 6th.

to be followed by a Workers' Consecration meeting in the Tabernacle, from 3 to 4 P. M., and the ordinance of the Lord's Supper in the Auditorium at 7.45 P. M., Bishop Fitzgerald presiding. On Aug. 18, Rev. Courtland Meyers, of Brooklyn, preaches morning and evening. From Aug. 19, camp meeting services will continue in unbroken succession until Sept. 2, the preachers being announced daily. Rev. Joseph Smith, D.D., will lead the afternoon services during the last ten days. On Sept. 1, the great Camp Meeting Love Feast will be celebrated, and the next day will witness the closing ceremonies. From Sept. 8 to 15, regular services will be held in the Auditorium, for the benefit of the thousands who delight to linger at the Grove even after the camp meeting and its attendant multitudes have gone.

Cheerful Little Helpers at Mont-Lawn

THE big, white tent on the hillside, is one of the first things which greets the eye of visitors as they approach our beautiful Children's Home by the woods, leading up to it. A little to one side is the tall flag-pole, whence "Old Glory" floats against the azure sky. What a good time hungry little fellows have satisfying ravenous appetites under that tent! Do you know that tent is a very active place to children at Mont-Lawn? It is a substantial rival to daisy fields and swinging scups, and whenever the important little drummer-beats his cheerful "rat-a-tat!" for bakfast, dinner, or supper, there is no hesitating response to the summons. Promptly they come from every direction, our boys and girls, with curls flying and faces aglow! into line they fall, and march valiantly to the tables, where, after singing their little song of thanks, they proceed to demonstrate unstinted appreciation of the good things set before them. In the kitchen porch small boys are receiving fresh relays of eatables from the busy hands of our cook.

The kitchen at Mont-Lawn is a place absorbing interest to our wee guests. To boy who is allowed to do small chores within its charmed precincts, or to carry trays of food and pitchers of milk to the big dining-tent, feels that he has won magnificent distinction. William, our good-natured Chef, lets children who are "very good indeed," help scrape potatoes, shell peas, string beans, etc., and the tot so favored is happy as a prince. It is the bestowal of a very high honor when William says: "Come here!" and draws from his store of spotless aprons one that just fits the pudgy laddie upon whom he ties it. An institution with the Order of the Golden Face, or with the Victoria Cross, hardly carries more pride and satisfaction to the recipient. The best of it is that the tent and kitchen boys may stay all summer. They are usually graduates, so to speak, of our institution—children who have been with us summer after summer, until they have outgrown the age limit of twelve years, and who then beg to be allowed to come to us as members of our band of workers. Little Ted, who came to us with no clothes to speak of, is now quite dignified and grand, in good jean overalls, a neat blouse, good shoes and the insignia of his office—a white apron. "Can't you get at your work?" he says to a new boy, who dawdles over the pan of potatoes he ought to be peeling. The home-life of one of our little kitchen-boys is inexpressibly sad; there are reasons why we do not think it right to reveal it; but if you knew, you would be very glad that he is to be at Mont-pale children of poverty need all that is being done for them—and more. We have never had before so many or such urgent applications for outings. Instead of a home accommodating 200 children at a time, we need one that would hold 2,000. The following are typical of the great mass of letters received from missionaries and parents in the tenement districts:—And who has the heart to refuse an appeal like any found below?

J. L. B.—"Can you receive two girls into your Fresh-Air Home? Their father has spent most of the year in the hospital. The family is so poor and worthy."—S. B.—"Would you please be so kind as to take my two children to the country? I am a widow with five children, and would be very thankful for the help."—A. R., Italian missionary, Brooklyn.—"Thirty boys and girls are ready for outings you so kindly give. With a few exceptions, they have never seen the country, and are extremely happy over anticipated pleasure."—K. S.—"You sent my son Frank to your Home last Thursday. My smaller boy wants to go. Frank writes he has such good times. If you could take the little boy, too, you would be doing me a great favor, as I am a widow, and have to leave my little ones alone all day while I go to work. My boys, I know, would be so safe with you." Mrs. P.—"My washerwoman, who is very deserving, has a feeble little girl who needs country air. Can you take her in at Mont-Lawn?"—E. H. H.—"I would like to put in an application for an outing for three children who need it sadly. The mother is an honest, hard-working woman. She was left a year ago with four children, the youngest an infant. Since that time she has worked very hard, cleaning offices; it is extremely difficult for her to provide for her little flock. They live in very cramped quarters, and hardly have the necessities of life."—E. E.—"I know a dozen little children in the poorer part of the city, who are very much in need of a little country air, and I wonder if you will take them to your beautiful home at Mont-Lawn?"

TYPICAL SCENE ON THE KITCHEN PORCH AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

Lawn all the summer. They are good, worthy little lads, our kitchen and tent-boys; their duties are very light and they have a great deal of playtime. Which is the most helpful to them, the work or the play it is sometimes difficult to decide. A number of girls and boys are now making a good living through the training they had at Mont-Lawn in past years. The great army of our tots are up there though, just to romp and swing, and eat and sleep, and have a good time. The

While the physical wants of our children are met their spiritual welfare is not forgotten, and through the atmosphere of kindness surrounding them, through pretty prayers and texts and Gospel songs, they learn of Jesus' love for little children. Only $3 sends a waif to Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $15 five; $30 ten; $60 sends twenty. You have no idea of what far-reaching good you may accomplish by helping us in this excellent work.

OUR SUPREME COURT JUSTICES and THEIR FAMILIES

MRS. WHITE

THE recent death in Riva, Italy, of Mrs. Brown, wife of Justice Brown, of the United States Supreme Court, has cast a shadow of gloom over official circles in Washington. Mrs. Brown had gone to Italy for her health. She was the daughter of Mr. Samuel Pitts, a wealthy merchant of Detroit, and it is probable that her body will be brought to that city for interment. Justice Brown has the handsomest home of any of the members of the Supreme Court circle in Washington; but it has always been a keen regret to both Justice and Mrs. Brown that there have been no children to gladden their home. Mrs. Brown was accustomed all her life to the advantages of wealth and position, and was a gentle, lovable Christian woman. She combined tact and grace as a hostess, and her winning personality made her Monday receptions events of real moment in the social world. Like four others of the families of the court circle—those of the Chief Justice, and Associate Justices Gray, Shiras and Peckham—Justice and Mrs. Brown were Episcopalian in their religious faith.

The present members of the Supreme Court are what might be termed old men, at least they all have the advantage of the judgment which the years of experience are supposed to give. Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Harlan are sixty-eight; Justice Gray is seventy-three; Justice Shiras is sixty-nine; Justice Brown is sixty-five; Justice Brewer sixty-four; Justice Peckham sixty-three; and the only two who are still in their fifties are Justices McKenna and White, who are fifty-eight and fifty-six, respectively.

The "Supreme Court circle" includes a very charming part of what is termed the official society of the National Capital. The justices hold their positions for life, and are not disturbed by changes. When they take up their abode in Washington, it is with the knowledge that they will remain. They and their families hold an undisputed social sway. Without exception, all maintain fine establishments; five of them own magnificent residences, and the hospitality of the Court homes is proverbial. The ladies of the Supreme Court families pay the first call upon the wife of the Vice-President, and upon each other, in the order of their husbands' ranking. Their "at home" days are the Mondays during the time the court is sitting. The home of the Chief Justice is out on West F street, in what was once the fashionable part of Washington. It is a roomy, comfortable dwelling, looking out on a fragrant garden and lawn. From the upper windows there is an expansive view of the Potomac and the outlying Virginia hills. Mrs. Fuller, the hostess of this lovely home, was born in Keokuk, Iowa, but moved with her father when a little girl to Chicago. He became President of the Union National Bank, and in course of time his daughter met and married Mr. Fuller, who then had not much more than passed the "briefless barrister" stage of his career. They have five daughters, three of whom are married, and one son. By a former marriage, the Chief Justice had two daughters. The family are members of the historic St. John's Episcopal Church, Mrs. Fuller being prominently identified with its charities.

Justice Harlan's home is at the head of Fourteenth street. It stands in a spacious yard, commanding an unsurpassed view of the city below it. Mrs. Harlan was the daughter of Mr. John Shanklin, of Indiana. She was born at Evansville, Indiana, and educated at Glendale Female College, in Ohio. She was married to Justice Harlan in 1856, and went with him to Ken-was born. His mother was the sister of that trio of illustrious brothers, David Dudley, Cyrus W., and Justice Stephen J. Field. Justice Brewer has never departed from his early training, and has always been closely and acutely identified with Christian work and enterprise. He is a member and officer in the First Congregational Church, and teaches a large Bible class. By his first marriage he had four daughters and one son. Two of his daughters and Mrs. Brewer died within a few months of each other some years ago, and for a time the family were crushed with their sorrow. In June of this summer, the Justice was married to Miss Mott, the principal of one of the Washington high schools, and a lady of many attainments and culture.

Before coming to Washington, Justice and Mrs. Shiras lived the greater part of their lives in Pennsylvania. Mrs. Shiras, who was Miss Lillie Kennel of Pittsburg, before her marriage, is well known in philanthropic circles. She is never too busy to do a kindness nor to help the needy. They have two married sons, whose homes are in Pittsburg, but who almost always bring their families and spend their summer holidays with their parents in their camp on Lake Michigan.

Justice White, soon after coming to Washington, was married to Miss Gibson, sister of the late Maryland Senator. Their residence on Island avenue is exquisitely appointed, and they entertain there the true Southern hospitality.

Justice Peckham's wife was the daughter of Mr. D. H. Arnold, president of the Mercantile Bank of New York and one of its oldest merchants. Soon after coming to Washington they lost their only son, and they have never engaged in any social gaieties since. Justice McKenna's home has always been one of the most popular. As a hostess Mrs. McKenna is greatly liked, and she is ably seconded by her three beautiful daughters. ABBY G. BARR

The Safe Way to Heaven

"It was no great credit to men that they called in question the authenticity of the four Gospels," wrote Principal Patton, "but how their scepticism has stimulated scholarly inquiry and strengthened the defenses of the Gospel narratives! When the elevated railroad was first started in New York, the people were a little timid about riding on it; so the proprietors of the road took great pleasure in apprising the public of the fact that this road had been subjected to a most abnormal and enormous tonnage, and that consequently people of ordinary weight might deem themselves quite safe in traveling over it. I feel the same way about the Gospels—that I can take my way to heaven, above the din and dust of daily life, because this elevated road has been tested and has given no sign of instability."

tucky, where they lived until he was appointed by President Hayes to the Supreme Court. Theirs is that best type of American homes, where God is honored. Their lives have been singularly happy. They were married when he was twenty-three and she seventeen. They were blessed with five children, three sons and two daughters, and although the greatest sorrow that ever came to them was in the death of their eldest daughter, yet the loss was in a measure softened to them by the presence of her baby daughter, who has always lived with them. Justice Harlan has a large Bible class in the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church in Washington, where he is a trustee. Mrs. Harlan is at the head of a number of philanthropic and charitable societies.

Justice Gray, up to sixty remained a bachelor, and then married the daughter of the late Stanley Matthews. Mrs. Gray is a charming little woman, and one of the most popular of hostesses. They have no children.

Justice Brewer was the son of American missionaries, who were laboring in Smyrna, Asia Minor, where he

CHINA'S AWFUL FIGHT WITH FAMINE

Terrible Scenes Described in a Letter to the Chinese Consul—Disease and Death Everywhere—Stealing Girls and Selling Children for a Morsel of Bread—An Official Relief Tour

At last the grim details of the terrible famine in Shansi, China, are coming to light. The ominous silence, for weeks past, as to what was going on behind those hills west of the Chi-li plain is now broken, and the story is one full of horror. The first news in many days comes through His Excellency Chow Fung-chi, the Chinese Consul in New York, who has finished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the following translation of a letter from a friend in Shansi, a Commissioner of the native Relief Department:

May 5.—Our party (seven) left Michi City to-day. On the way we saw numbers of refugees coming down the south, as thin as skeletons, eating tree leaves, and apparently enjoying them.

May 6.—Stop at a temporary asylum, where nine out of ten lodgers were seriously sick. Gave all medicines our possession. Superintendent said ten or twenty fine fever deaths every day.

May 7.—Started for Fung-shiang, three o'clock in the morning; saw many dead bodies on the road. The local authority was supervising their burial. In a destarving, and medicines to the sick from five o'clock in the morning till eight in the evening. We had not drunk a drop of water, but did not feel thirsty; could not eat a bite of bread, yet not feel hungry. Buried sixty-six dead bodies.

Selling their Children for Bread

"May 12.—Arrived at Puchi Bridge, distributed food and medicine, but not so much as yesterday. A man here was selling his boy for $2. Asked him why, and he answered with tears, that his wife was starving at home and there was no room in the hospital for her. He tried to sell their boy and save his wife. The boy was crying. We gave the man $4. Buried seven bodies.

"May 13.—Arrived at Pie-yin Temple. Distributed food. Not many sick here. Met a southern man with four girls, a Fung-yang man with six girls, and a Hsao-hing man with four girls, all of who were bought in the village at a very cheap price. Two of the girls were crying bitterly. My companion, Chu, paid ten times the original prices for them, and sent them back to our headquarters and asylum.

"May 14.—Arrived West Pie-yin Temple. Distrib-

"May 18.—Order from headquarters. I had to return to buy provisions. The local authorities here caught six dealers in girls, and put them to death in an iron cage. Sixty-seven girls were rescued, and turned over to my charge. Sent notice to their families. Distributed food and cash. Buried six bodies.

"May 19.—Food again exhausted. Distributed cash and medicines. Buried fourteen bodies.

"May 20.—Our provision wagons arrived. Five carriages passed our quarter with twenty women. We stopped them, and the slave-dealers ran away. The women were rescued and sent to headquarters and the asylum [shelter].

"May 21.—Distributed food among starving people in the temporary asylums; our three wagons of dried bread are now finished. Buried fourteen bodies.

"May 22.—News from headquarters asking me to get more provisions from the south. Started at three o'clock P.M."

Whence Help Must Come

Here ends the letter, abruptly, but it is enough. It is a revelation that shocks the reader and recalls with sted cafe met a boy of about fourteen, dying from hunger. We rescued him and fed him with bread and water. He told us that both his parents and sisters died to days ago. We notified the kind-hearted authorities to bury them, and sent the boy to the hospital. He died bitterly on his departure, and we all shed tears.

May 8.—A dreadful scene in the woods to-day. A number of hungry birds fighting for a dead body. Many women and children were crying for mercy, and giving their last breath. We gave away all the provisions we carried with us.

A Land of Dead and Dying

May 9.—Turned out of our way to a big city, and tried to buy some more provisions, but could not get any. Had to stop there, and wait for our provision wagon. Saw fifty-six dead bodies, and hired some coolies to bury them.

May 10.—Early this morning our wagons came with plenty of provisions and medicines, and four soldiers from the Governor's body-guard. We started at noon, for an inspection of the poor quarters in the city, and distributed some food. Buried seventeen bodies.

May 11.—Arrived Pei-mun. Distributed food to the uted food. About five A.M. met a band of men (buyers of girls) fighting ten soldiers. One of the latter was killed and two wounded. The ruffians escaped with their goods in wagons and on horseback, though they lost ten of their comrades. Buried six dead bodies.

"May 15.—Thunderstorm this afternoon. Many sick persons were relieved here. Distributed bread. More wagons came from headquarters at Si-Ngai-fu. Buried eleven bodies. Clothing and furniture were scattered around everywhere here.

May 16.—Arrived at Fung-chi. Distributed food. Buried eight bodies. A Fung-yang man came to the inn with five girls who cried the whole night. We asked the owner to spare them for a big reward, but he refused. Some of us cried that night, too. To-day, the market price for wheat was 92 cents, corn 66 cents, green peas 95 cents, a quarter of a caty (?) People said these were the most moderate prices.

"May 17.—Two of us walked across a bridge near a temple here, and saw two bodies that were eaten by dogs. Asked the Buddhist priests in the temple to help us bury the bodies. They refused, and went to their kitchen to prepare their meal. We dug the ground with a wooden stick, and buried the remains.

startling distinctness the very worst features of the great India famine, when the misery of the people was at its height, and when famine, fever and death were present on every side. In China the element of lawlessness is added, and the continuous conflict between the stealers of girls and women on the one hand, and the troops and local authorities on the other, makes a grim background to the general tragedy which is now in progress in Shansi and three other provinces.

From the letter given above it is evident that both the Imperial and provincial authorities have bent all their energies to fight back the famine, but in vain. Help must come from without, otherwise thousands will perish where hundreds are now dying. That help is doubtless now at hand, and even while we read this letter—so terrible in its realism—the hands of our missionaries are dealing out the bread and the medicines that mean life and strength to the starving and fever-stricken multitudes.

Behavior in Church

AROUND the door of country meeting houses it has always been the custom for the people to gather, before church and after church, for social intercourse and the shaking of hands. Perhaps, because we ourselves were born in the country, and never got over it, the custom pleases us. In the cities, we arrive at the last moment before service and go away the first moment after. We act as though the church were a railroad car, into which we go when the time for starting arrives, and we get out again as soon as the depot of the doxology is reached. We protest against this business way of doing things. Shake hands when the benediction is pronounced with those who sat before and those who sat behind you. Meet the people in the aisle, and give them Christian salutation. Such greeting is not made with the left hand. The left hand is good for a great many things, for instance, to hold a fork or twist a curl, but it was never made to shake hands with, unless you have lost the use of the right. Nor is it done by the tips of the fingers laid loosely in the palm of another. Nor is it done with a glove on. Gloves are good to keep out the cold and make one look well, but have them so they can easily be removed, as they should be, for they are non-conductors of Christian magnetism. Make bare the hand. Place it in the palm of your friend. Clench the fingers across the back part of the hand you grip. Then let all the animation of your heart rush to the shoulder, and from there to the elbow, and then through the forearm and through the wrist, till your friend gets the whole charge of Gospel electricity.

There are some of the best Christian people who do not know how to carry themselves in religious assemblage. They never laugh, they never applaud, they never hiss. Yet, notwithstanding, are disturbers of public worship. There is, for instance, the coughing brigade. If any individual right ought to be maintained at all hazards, it is the right of coughing. There are times when you must cough. There is an irresistible tickling in the throat which demands audible demonstration. It is moved, seconded and unanimously carried that those who have irritable wind-pipes be heard. But there are ways, with hand or handkerchief, of breaking the repercussion. A smothered cough is dignified and acceptable if you have nothing better to offer. But how many audiences have had their peace sacrificed by unrestrained expulsion of air through the glottis! After a sudden change in the weather, there is a fearful charge made by the coughing brigade. Brethren and sisters who took cold by sitting in the same draught, join the clamor, and it is glottis to glottis, and laryngitis to laryngitis, and a chorus of scrapings and explosions which make the service hideous for a preacher with sensitive nerves. Cough by all means, but put on the brakes when you come to the down-grade, or send the racket through at least one fold of your pocket-handkerchief.

Corroding Care

FEW of us have to bear the weight of terrible calamities; disasters and catastrophes are the exceptional experiences of life. But corroding care, the pressure of small, wearying and wearing anxiety, comes to many, and cannot be thrown off. Sometimes a son, just on the verge of manhood, is about to take a wrong turning, or has already made a false step; the parent, with eyes open to the sorrow and danger that the younger life must know, suffers as if a cross were laid on his or her own shoulders. Sometimes children are ungrateful, and "sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." Now and then, we are aware of a slowly creeping disease, attacking the outworks of the body, and one day, sure, humanly speaking, to strike at the very core and centre of the citadel. There are those who can never get ahead; work or try as they may, they repeat forever the role of the fabled Sisypheus, whose stone could not be pushed up hill because it was always falling down again.

There are promises to those who are burdened. One is, "As thy days thy strength shall be." Another is, "Cast thy burden on the Lord and he shall sustain thee." Another is, "My peace I give unto you." Christ can give peace amid corroding care. Christ may not see fit to remove the load, nor to take away the grief, nor to give ease to the hampering circumstances. What the Master sees is best for the disciple in the long, long ages, that he will do. But the way shall not be too hard, the care shall not eat too deeply into the tissues of the soul, if there be trust and obedience. We may bear the scars of the conflict, but at least we shall emerge victorious, if we rest in the Lord and believe in his name.

The Fear of Thunder and Lightning

AS usual at this season, accidents from electric storms are reported, and a number of deaths by lightning will be chronicled before the summer is over. A husband and wife took refuge from a heavy shower under a tree the other day, in a place not far from New York. A bolt struck the tree and the man was killed by his wife's side. A tree is not a safe place to seek for shelter when lightning is abroad. One would better far remain in the open. But, though some are sufferers from this danger, in comparison with the vast majority who escape those who encounter casualties are few. In view of this small percentage, and in remembrance of the care of God under which we all dwell, how foolish it is to walk in lifelong terror. Most of those who shudder and shiver at the coming of lightning could govern the fear if they tried. Yielded to, dread and fear become tyrants, and paralyze the will. Resolutely fought, one is able to overcome them, and maintain freedom.

A person who is in bondage to her fright in a thunder storm, imposes a measure of her own spirit upon her family and friends who sympathize with her, and is in danger of setting a bad example to servants and children, who are apt to imitate the behavior of those with whom they live. No one is obliged to take undue risks, and if precautions are likely to afford mental ease they should not be scorned. A woman who feels best in a feather-bed in a thunder-storm, should secure that comfort if she can. But trust in God, express no fear, and be composed if you can.

EDITORIAL NOTES

IN the remarkable experiments of M. Santos-Dumont, the young Brazilian aeronaut, in Paris, there would seem to be the presage of a great discovery near at hand. If after centuries of effort, man is at last to become "master of the air," as he is now of sea and land, who can tell what revolutions may come in mundane methods. One of the first results of conquering the secret of aerial navigation, might be to render the present armaments of the nations practically useless. The battlefields of the future would be amid the clouds, and the nation having the largest and best equipped flying squadrons, up in the blue, would be the real world-power. Passenger balloons, sailing in delightfully high latitudes, would make wanderers forget the weariness and fatigue of summer travel. The "round-the-world" trip would become a very simple undertaking, occupying possibly a few weeks at most, with suitable stop-overs for sight-seeing. That old mystery, the North Pole, theme of daring song and tragic story, would cease to be important, for there would be no geographical limitations to the explorer in a balloon-experiment. But we are probably a long way yet from aerial navigation, as a practical science. What M. Santos-Dumont has done to demonstrate the possibility of constructing a machine which can be steered in any direction at will—in other words, he has scored the most substantial triumph in aeronautics that has been recorded in well nigh a hundred years. Val Montgolfier and the old-time pioneer aeronauts did, as simply to demonstrate that their machines could travel considerable distances and rise to great altitudes; but they were always at the mercy of the wind, and their balloons were the sport of the elements. Count Zeppelin, with his giant balloon on Lake Constance, went a step further, and showed that it was possible in light winds, and favoring conditions generally, to operate such a machine, but the slightest increase in the wind's force rendered his craft unmanageable.

IN these torrid days there is doubtless much to try the average temper; indeed, a person with any temper at all is very apt to show it when the mercury is around the nineties. But in the interest of justice, we ought to be careful not to indulge in such moods at the expense of others, especially of those who least of all deserve abuse. Chief Willis L. Moore, the head of the Weather Bureau in Washington, has perhaps been the worst sufferer in this connection. Somebody, with a taste for gossip, said that Mr. Moore had predicted at the prevailing heat would increase and endure at least a month, which would mean a national calamity. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has Chief Moore's own assurance, that no such prediction was ever uttered by him or by any officer of his Bureau. Yet he has been roundly criticized and abused for it in a thousand different directions, and some have gone so far as to demand his retirement. Of course, knowing the facts as above set forth, we do not believe anyone will join in condemnation of a man for words he never uttered.

A Descendant of Great Preachers

From the New York Observer

SOME weeks since I called attention to the fact that the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, D.D., a missionary for twenty-eight years of the American Board, had been appointed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as chairman of its Missionary Famine Relief Committee. Dr. Smith was known to many readers as the author of several series of articles first published in the New York Observer long before his book on China and his brilliant service, during and since the siege of Peking, brought him into world-wide fame. When asked by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to name a man who could administer a famine relief fund most satisfactorily, his name was given with perfect confidence. Our readers may like to know more of him. He is a lineal descendant on his mother's side from the Rev. Solomon Stoddard, the grandfather of Jonathan Edwards, who was pastor of the church at Northampton, Mass., for sixty years. His father was an honored clergyman at South Vernon, Conn., and Galesburg, Ill. His mother was Sarah Tappan Stoddard, of Northampton, Mass., a woman of beauty and mental ability, interested from her early years in missions, and the author of a volume upon South Sea Missions. Though a widow, she consecrated her son to the same service to which her youngest brother, the Rev. David Tappan Stoddard, gave his life, and he lived to see him useful and honored in his far-away China field. He has now been there for twenty-eight years, his one visit to this country. During the famine in China, more than ten years since, he was the almoner of British and American relief contributions, and gained great influence among the Chinese of the North by his judicious and painstaking distribution of food and money.

Dr. Smith's long knowledge of the Chinese, wide acquaintance and benevolent interest in the people among whom he has spent his life, eminently fit him to be the distributor of American charity to those who are suffering from famine and pestilence. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has associated with Dr. Arthur H. Smith in this work, the Rev. Irenis Atwood, D.D., of the American Board, and the Rev. H. H. Lowry, of the Methodist Mission, Americans who have served long and honorably in the China field; the Rev. H. Edwards, M.B., of the China Inland Mission, and the Rev. M. B. Duncan, of the English Baptist Mission, both veterans in the work.

To these men, twenty thousand dollars was sent a few weeks ago, and another equal sum was sent June 26 by Klopsch, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Twenty thousand dollars more will be added in a few days, and it is expected that by the end of July, a hundred thousand dollars will be raised. The public can trust these men in China to discharge this responsibility which they have so cheerfully undertaken, in addition to their manifold labors, with judgment, promptness and Christian kindness.

We do not hesitate to encourage a work undertaken by such men, under circumstances which demand immediate action, and conditions which appeal to every benevolent heart.

Send for China Famine Fund Mite Boxes

Our Missionary Committee is now actively at work in the Four Famine Provinces of China—Shansi, Shensi, Shantung and Chi-li. $40,000 of Fund money has already been cabled to them, but the work is so extensive, and the need so urgent that every penny, dime and dollar will be gladly welcomed. A dollar may save many lives; it will keep a famine-stricken household alive at least a week. All should have a share in this work of life-saving and soul-winning. Churches, Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor, and other Young Peoples Societies should SEND FOR FREE MITE BOXES supplied in any quantities desired on demand.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Great Strike

ONE of the most ominous strikes of modern times is that which began on July 15 in the steel trade. It was foreseen when the aggregation of capital was made to control the steel industries of the United States that the interests of the labor unions would be imperiled. Some of the mills acquired by the great Corporation were non-union mills, and in others the workers were members of the union working with laborers who were not members. It was evident that in any future struggle between the steel workers and the Corporation the men would be placed at a disadvantage by the thin condition of its service. A rough estimate was made, which showed that of the 220,000 mechanics employed by the Corporation at its various mills, at least 85,000 were union men. The Amalgamated Association to which the latter belonged, asked the new Corporation to make a uniform scale for all its mills. It was first asserted that the Association had demanded that the Corporation should make all its mills union mills, but this has since been authoritatively denied. The demand is that the scale which the Corporation is willing to sign for its union mills, shall be the scale for its non-union mills, so that the non-union worker shall receive the same remuneration and work the same number of hours as the union worker. The Corporation refused to accede to this demand, contending that the Association had no right to make terms for men who were not members of the union. Conferences were held in the hope of effecting a compromise which would permit of the works being carried on pending negotiation, but they proved futile, and the strike was accordingly ordered. About thirty thousand men left their work, and it is computed that fully twenty thousand others will be rendered idle, and sympathetic action may involve a much larger number. It is a most deplorable result, and if the strike continues, must involve great loss to the employers and much suffering to the employees. But will learn by sad experience the truth of the principle laid down by the Apostle:

"I can say unto thee, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you... there should be no division in the body... whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it (I. Cor. 12: 21, 26)."

Germs Laden Money

A recent number of a medical journal contained the account of some experiments made by a college professor with paper money. He had been spending his vacation in Cuba, and was impressed with the filthy condition of the paper currency in use there. He formed the opinion that if the notes were analyzed, they would be found to contain septic germs. A few notes, which had evidently been in use for some time, were chosen for experiment. The result of the analysis fully confirmed the professor's belief. It was estimated that two notes weighing altogether about fifteen grains, contained more than nineteen thousand germs of various kinds. Cultures were made in broth, gelatine, and agar, and these were injected into the peritoneal cavity of rats and guinea pigs, most of which died in twenty-four hours, the post-mortem examination showing signs of peritonitis and congestion of the liver and kidneys. The blood of the heart and peritoneum was made use of to inoculate solid media, in which colonies developed so rapidly that it was impossible to determine their precise nature, many different forms being intermingled. As some of our own currency is rather dirty, possibly we may be exposed to malarial danger, but if its possession involved no other peril than that of spreading disease it would not be so much to be apprehended as it is. The most common evil that comes from it is that of making the possessor of it eager for more, and indifferent as to the righteousness of the methods by which he obtains it.

"Blessed is the man that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare... which draw men into destruction and perdition (I. Tim. 6: 9)."

Worthless Plunder

The story is told of a thief who made a losing investment in a northern city some time ago. In the course of his excursions about the city to discover opportunities for the exercise of his occupation, he noticed that a firm of grocers who do a large business in tea and coffee were somewhat careless about the safety of the bags of coffee which lay on the sidewalk in front of their store. He, therefore, hired a horse and wagon, paying two dollars for the use of it, and about dusk drove up to the corner near the store. The bags were still there, and he quietly took one, carried it to the wagon and drove off. Having taken it to a place of safety and taken back the wagon, he returned to examine his plunder. Then, to his dismay, he found that though the bag had contained coffee-berries, it was now filled with sand. The grocers had been using bags of that worthless material to impress passers-by with the extent of their dealings in coffee. The facts were learned through the effrontery of the thief, who wrote a black-mailing letter to the firm, threatening to expose them if they did not reimburse him with the two dollars he had paid for the hire of the horse and wagon. He had forgotten, as do many other dishonest men whose knavish tricks are not so open a violation of the law, that fraudulent schemes often prove worthless in this world, besides surely bringing a curse in the next.

"He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days (Jer. 17: 11)."

Unremunerated Service

An unremunerative occupation is pursued by a woman, according to her son's account. "My mother gets me up, makes the fire, and gets my breakfast, and sends me off," said a bright youth. "Then she gets my father up, gets his breakfast, and sends him off. Then she gives the other children their breakfast, and sends them to school; and then she and the baby have their breakfast." "How old is the baby?" asked the reporter. "Oh, she is most two, but she can talk and walk as well as any of us." "Are you well paid?" "I get $4 a week, and my father gets $3.50 a day." "How much does your mother get?" With a bewildered look, the boy said: "Mother? Why, she don't work for anybody." "I thought you said she worked for all of you." "Oh, yes! for us she does, but there isn't any money in it." As the boy grows older he will find that very many of the world's best workers toil without any prospect of making money by their labors, and very often they do not win the gratitude of those who benefit by their exertions. Missionaries, preachers, and Christian workers know that their occupation has "no money in it," but, like their Master, they will eventually be satisfied as they look back on their travail of soul.

By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities (Isa. 53: 11).

An Immigrant's Difficulty

A singular dispute has come up for settlement in the Immigration bureau in New York. A man of German birth came to America last week on the Deutschland, accompanied by a German girl to whom he wished to be married. On being examined by the medical staff, it was found that he had heart disease, and the Commissioners ordered him sent back to Germany. Thereupon he appealed, and told a remarkable story. He said he came to this country ten years ago and was naturalized. He remained here and made a small fortune. Then, hearing that a girl whom he had known in Germany was still unmarried, he decided to go over and marry her and return. But on going to her home, he found her family opposed to the marriage; and he persuaded her to return with him and be married here. She consented, but their plans were thwarted by the decision of the Commissioners to send the couple back. The question now turns on the man's naturalization. It turns out that he took out only first papers, and did not apply, at the end of the five years, for the second papers which would have completed his naturalization. The Commissioners contend that the mere declaration of his intentions did not constitute him a citizen, and therefore he must be regarded as a newly arrived immigrant, and as heart disease has developed since his examination ten years ago, they are right in excluding him. It is probable, however, that they will not insist on their right, as the man is not likely ever to become a public charge. The Commissioners say that it is quite common for people who have only declared their intentions to consider themselves citizens. Many people make a similar mistake about their relation to Christ's kingdom. They claim to belong to it because of their baptism in infancy or admission to church membership, forgetting that only those can be Christ's people who have fulfilled Christ's conditions.

Verily I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God (John 3: 3).

BRIEF NOTES

The British and Foreign Bible Society has decided to publish the Revised Edition of the Bible as well as the Authorized, but the latter will be supplied in all cases except where a special request is made for the Revised.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has arranged to conduct a series of evangelistic services at Springfield, Ill., beginning on Sunday next. They will be held in connection with the Holiness Camp Meeting in Machinery Hall, a building capable of accommodating five thousand persons.

Dr. Talmage expects to lecture at Winona Lake Assembly, Warsaw, Ind., on August 1, and at Mountain Lake Park, Maryland, on August 5 and 6. During this month he has lectured and preached in various cities. On July 18 at Buffalo; on July 20 at Chautauqua; on July 24 at Bay View Assembly, Michigan; on July 27 at Monona Lake, Madison, Wis.

Lord Radstock suggests that the death of Queen Victoria should be commemorated in India by giving a copy of the New Testament in the vernacular, to each native of India.

A very interesting Missionary Conference has just been held in Stockholm, the capital of Sweden. In all, some seventy missionaries took part, and a number of Christian workers were invited, prominent among whom was Prince Bernadotte, second son of King Oscar, who was chairman.

An effort is being made to promote the circulation of the Bible in Alaska. A commissioner of the Bible Society is now visiting the field to establish agencies. Mr. H. L. Sizer, Starr-Boyd building, Seattle, Wash., would be glad to receive contributions toward the expense of the work.

An interesting experiment is being tried at New Brunswick. Rev. A. B. Sears, pastor of the Livingston avenue Baptist Church in that town, has opened a nursery in connection with the church, where skillful nurses take charge of babies while the mothers attend the services of the church.

Pledging Friendship with God

GOD'S PROMISE TO ABRAHAM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST, 11. GEN. 15:1-18
GOLDEN TEXT -- I AM THY SHIELD AND THY EXCEEDING GREAT REWARD. GEN. 15:1

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Craft

WHAT a story of adventure the history of Abraham would make if freshly retold, withholding his name to avoid the dulling influence of familiarity. In a time when travel was uncommon and dangerous, this "pilgrim father" left his wicked country and idolatrous kindred, and with "ships of the desert," with wife, and nephew, and attendants, voyaged forth, he knew not whither, to give his family a new start in a new land. His zeal lagged half way to the destination to which Providence was leading him; but at last he reached the land of promise. Corrupt Canaanites possessed it then, but he might have said to them; as a great leader of modern times said to his opponents, when a reform he sought was postponed: "The past is yours, the present also for that matter, but the future is ours." Famine brought physical perils, and drove him to greater moral perils in Egypt. Prosperity prompted quarrels between his herdmen and those of Lot, but he nobly yielded his rights, for peace. But in the period between the last lesson and the present one, he made war for the recapture of that same Lot, whose foolish choice to live in Sodom had involved him in the capture of that city by its foes. Abraham, with a little band of 318 trained servants, by a swift, strategic night attack, routed the five chiefs who had carried off Lot and his goods, and brought them back, and all else captured in Sodom. Of all the goods recovered and captured, Abraham gave a tenth to Melchizedek, a mysterious priest of the Most High God in Salem, the ancient Jerusalem. He refused to take anything for himself, the most signal part of the victory, as we may realize when we see how the victory of Christian nations in the recent relief of Peking has been eclipsed by the robberies in which the victors have indulged.

I am thy shield. After victory often comes depression. It was after Elijah had utterly vanquished the priests at Baal that he fled to the juniper tree and wished he could die. It was after the baptism that Jesus had his supreme temptation in the wilderness. So Abraham, when the excitement of battle was passed, in physical exhaustion began to think of the revenge these mighty chiefs would plan against his little company, who had won only by strategy. Into such an hour God dropped one of his many "fear notes." To gather these would be to store a host of lights for dark hours. "I am thy shield," God said. Surely he who really believes God stands as an invisible shield of omnipotence between him and every real harm, will waste no strength in fears. Fear and faith each displace the other as night and day. "Perfect love casteth out fear" by quickening faith.

Abraham may have regretted in his depression that he had refused all share in the booty. To this feeling God seems to address that other assurance, "And thy exceeding great reward." Surely no one can feel poor who has God for his rewarder. "No good thing will he withhold." The greatest rewards in life are God's approval and self-respect.

Look now toward heaven and number the stars. Abraham, still depressed, recalled

God's twenty-year-old promise that he should have a son, and Stories of Stars. through him become the father of many people. To this God said, in that wonderful conversation when God and man talked together "as one talketh with his friend," "Look up and count the stars; so shall thy seed be." "All God's biddings are enablings." That promise has already been more than fulfilled in the number of Jews and Christians, both of whom are now counted in millions, while the number of stars Abraham could see with the naked eye at one place was only about two thousand. Only six thousand are so visible from all points, and astronomers estimate the total number of stars visible, even by telescopes, as only six hundred thousand.

A party of tourists were leaving Jaffa for Alexandria. Though the moon was full and all the stars shining, one bright star especially, that the tourists had watched in Bethlehem, Jerusalem and Nazareth, the wind was blowing a gale, and the waves ran high about the little boat in which these passengers were being carried a quarter of a mile to the waiting steamer. The ladies were frightened by the waves, and the wild shouting of the Arab boatmen increased their fears. One lady suggested to another to shut her eyes so that she could not see the waves, but another older and wiser woman said, "Open your eyes, Glady, and keep looking at that beautiful star; keep looking at the star, keep looking at the star." All took the hint, and the effect was that the calm, steady light of that star seemed to pour peace down into every soul. So in trying days that followed Abraham's talk with God, he kept looking at the promise God had written in stars on the sky. Some one has counted thirty-one thousand promises in the Bible, thirty-one thousand stars at which we should "keep looking," especially in dark and stormy hours in the voyage of life. When the Magi were seeking the child Jesus, in weariness and danger and darkness, they kept looking at the star that promised the world a Saviour and King. That is the "one bright star" in the promises of God. That "one bright star" was in the promise to Abraham that in his seed the homes of the earth should be blessed.

Childless yet, he was not faithless. "He believed in the Lord." When a man says of some Bible truth, "I do not believe," say to him "WHOM?" It is not a word, but the Lord, we do not believe. It has been well said: "When men and women say what they do not believe, it is as when people get hold of a bank-note they do not believe in, and pass it quietly on to the next man who will take it." Goethe said, "If you believe anything, tell me, but keep your doubts to yourself; I have enough of my own."

To give thee this land. It is a striking fact that the "land of promise" as here bounded (v. 18), is three times as great as the land possessed by Joshua. Not until Solomon was the full promise realized. As Abraham stopped at Haram for years when he should have gone on to Canaan, so his descendants in the days of Joshua grew weary of conquest when only one-third of what God had promised had been possessed. And his spiritual descendants in the Christian Church have few of them appropriated more than one-third of their great and precious promises of "rest" and "victory."

Take me a heifer and a she goat and a ram and a turtle dove and a young pigeon. Here are the five offerings afterward elaborated in Leviticus, acted prayers of penitence, thanksgiving and consecration. In place of sacrifices we have sacraments. As the sacrifices pointed forward to the Cross, sacraments point back to it. As in the sacrifices men that of any in his household, if need be, in behalf of the one to whom he makes this pledge. In the divided sacrifice of this lesson, Abraham pledges himself as such a "friend of God" that he will refuse him nothing, not his own life, not life of any in his home. God tested his loyalty to that; when he bade him offer Isaac, and he was not found wanting. But it is God himself who passes between the pieces in the "burning lamp," the Shechinah that is afterward in the burning bush, and the pillar of fire and the Shechinah cloud of the tabernacle and the Transfiguration.

This is the Old Covenant or Old Testament, the center of that first division of the Bible as Calvary, which it pictures the centre of the New Covenant or New Testament. Because men forget or otherwise break promises lightly, we strengthen them by oaths, pledges, vows, all of which are promises made with unusual solemnity. God condescends to Abraham's unbelief, and takes a solemn oath by passing between the pieces, that the doubting one may be assured of God's fidelity and friendship. So in the Cross, God makes a "better covenant" enacted on "better promises," a covenant to make the whole world a "holy land," filled with the true seed of Abraham. God swears it by the death of his only begotten Son. And we recall and renew that covenant in the Lord's Supper.

THE "BETTER PROMISES" OF THE "BETTER COVENANT."

He hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises, that through these we may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law having become a curse for us, that upon the Gentiles might come the blessing of Abraham in Christ, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith. And if ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, heirs, according to promise. But now hath he obtained a ministry the more excellent, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant which hath been enacted upon better promises. We bring you good tidings of the promise made unto the fathers, how that God hath fulfilled the same unto our children in the raised up Jesus. Let us hold fast the confession of our hope that it waver not, for he is faithful that promised.

This is an age when an increasing number refuse to pledge themselves to total abstinence, or even to church membership. They ask to be left more free than God, who reserves to himself no freedom to do wrong. "He cannot deny himself." And let us not forget that God has often pledged himself in condescension, when unnecessary, to encourage others.

As the rainbow is made of water drops, illumined by the sun, it would be fitting to print a rainbow as a seal on any pledge with the watchword, "Even God pledged himself setting his bow in the cloud." And God's pledge to Abraham should prompt us to take our pledge to God in church membership beside the altar-cross of Calvary. The man who refuses to make these pledges, is neglecting himself in less important matters every day in every note and contract he makes. He pledges himself to his wife for life; what not to his Creator also?

If it were enough to love Christ, our devotion, secretly, and "make no public profession" of that love as so many claim to believe, it would, on the same principle, be enough to love a woman secretly and not the public profession of that love which we call marriage. For the same reasons the men need to have a public act of marriage, a public oath of office, and a signed contract in business, they need to make a public and distinct covenant with God and his church. Even in every-day life our lesser promises should be sacredly kept. To break a promise is a lie, often of the worst kind.

The whole Bible is a history of covenants of God with man, of man with God, and of men with each other. It came God's covenant with man for the occupancy of the earth. The only rent charged was obedience. When that was refused God kept his word, and Paradise was lost, reminding us that God's promises of punishment are no less sure than his promises of reward. Then came the covenants with Noah and Abraham; with Jacob at Bethel; with Moses at the Burning Bush; with David, who, like Abraham, was promised great things for his "seed." Again and again the whole nation of Israel covenanted or promised to serve God. Then came the New Testament, the new covenant, the promise, which is most fully expressed in Luke 4, the promise of a better world through the influence of Christ's love, a covenant whose blood-red seal was the Cross.

In order to fully appreciate Abraham's great life, we must read not alone the story of it in Genesis, but the commentaries of the later Bible writers in Josh. 24:2-14; Ps. 105; Jas. 2:14-23. Especially, in connection with the subject of this lesson, it would be well to study Hebrews 6:13-20, in which the significance of this incident of the Patriarch's life is discussed in its relation to the better covenant, which was confirmed by Oriental pledges, but by the pledge of the Lamb as it had been slain.

AN ANCIENT DUTCH ARTIST'S CONCEPTION OF ABRAHAM'S VISION

offered themselves a "living sacrifice" in the wholeburnt offering, so do we in every sincere use of the sacraments sacredly devote ourselves and all our powers to the glory of God and the good of man; to be his sacred vessels, bearing the wine of his self-sacrificing love and the bread of brotherhood to our fellows. Let not familiarity dull us to the two great truths, that baptism is a pledge and prayer of the putting away of sin, and that the Lord's Supper is an oath of loyalty to God and love to man.

A burning lamp that passed between those pieces. In Bible lands it has been for ages the custom to ratify a covenant or agreement or contract or any solemn and important promise by cutting some animal in twain and walking between the parts (Jer 34:8). The most impressive use of this sacrificial oath is when it is made the pledge of "blood brotherhood." For the benefit of new readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we repeat in brief the story, told in the first quarter of last year, of General Grant's reception by an Oriental in Egypt who was acting as American Consul. An ox was killed and its severed parts laid at the sides of the door-sill, between which General Grant entered with his host, who thus made the covenant "blood brotherhood," which binds him who makes it to give even his own life or

FOUNTAIN OF THE VIRGIN

IV. TOMBS OF THE MIGHTY

By REV. THEODORE F. WRIGHT, PH.D.

AFTER the traveler in Palestine, or the reader of these articles, has found that the tombs of the patriarchs are in Hebron, in one undisputed locality, so that no one doubts though not permitted to see, he naturally hopes to find a cemetery, or collection of tombs of the kings. He finds the statement repeatedly made that kings were buried in place. Thus, "Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father," II. Kings 15 : 38, and "Ahaz was buried with his father in the city of David," II. Kings 16 : 20; and so the way. This uniformity is emphasized by a rare exception, as in the case of Manasseh, who was buried "in the garden of his own house," II. Kings 21 : 18. On the other hand, the kings of Israel are said to have been buried at Samaria, and probably in one spot.

There are certain large tombs near Jerusalem, which are pointed out as of David, the Kings, the Judges and the Prophets, but there is nothing whatever to prove the claims, and there is reason to believe they are late tombs, most probably of Roman noble families.

We must remember that Jerusalem and its vicinity are exceedingly hilly, and that the natural tendency of the hills is to let slip some of their substance under the heavy winter rains. Now, a tomb cut in the face of a hill at its base, by clearing away the soil and excavating the soft rock, would be likely in course of time to be covered over by the slipping down of the hill. This is why the tombs are so outside of the city, but in the city there would be the additional covering of ruined buildings, which the deepest place now covers the original soil to the depth of one hundred feet.

We know very nearly where the tombs of the kings are from what is said by Josephus, who knew them, and from what is inferred from the statements in the Scriptures, and it seems right to locate them somewhere on the hill Ophel, south of the temple area, outside the present wall, but originally within the wall, as recent excavations show. This outer wall has been fully traced, but the imperial permit expired before the work could go further.

There is a very general feeling now, and this is shared by very careful scholars, that we can tell very nearly where the tombs are, by a deduction from the course of the conduit running from the Virgin's Fountain, which was always outside of the walls, to the Pool of Siloam, which was always inside the walls in old times. By means of this conduit the people would have the water in case of siege, and all the water would at all times be saved to irrigate the gardens in the king's dale.

If a map of the district be carefully examined, and if it be remembered that the Wady Sitti Matyam "the valley of Saint Mary," is the Valley of Kedron, or Jehoshaphat or the King's Dale, we observe the Virgin's Fountain in the northeastern corner, and the Pool of Siloam in the southwestern. Between these is the crooked line of the conduit. There is reason to believe that a straighter conduit ran outside the walls to the valley, but this we are not concerned with. The conduit or tunnel, which still carries some water, has been explored at risk of life, and is no doubt correctly laid down. Now immediately after leaving the starting place it bears westward into the hill, in order not to come to the surface, and then it bears nearly south, and shows the point of meeting of the two working parties and also two little errors. Finally, it makes a sweep westward to the Pool. Now, at the point marked "A" a shaft was sunk and nothing found; but that is not the place which Gauveau and others contend for. That place is on the other side of the conduit, and is thought of as accounting for the eastward bearing of the long curve. Some time the tombs will be found, but Hyrcanus and Herod are known to have plundered them.

In the case of such a tomb, we know from many others that we shall find a single entrance, with rooms and places for bodies extending as far as there was need. The tomb known of the Prophets illustrates this; other tombs show room after room in less elaborate form.

Of the Prophets, it must be said that they generally found dishonored graves, as their messages were also treated; but we shall remember the saying of our Lord, "Ye build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous" (Matt. 23 : 29), and thus tardily were the great men of Israel given fitting burial. Only a few years since, in the village of Siloam, near where Isaiah was said to have been put to death by torture, a tomb was found bearing the inscription which is figured. The lower word is plainly "prophet." The last letters of the upper line clearly give "Isaia." The letters preceding spell in Greek the word for "holy." The first letters may mean "built to" from the word ktizo. The Jews were using Greek instead of Hebrew for such purposes in our Lord's time. A built tomb may mean one like a little house with a dome upon it, and these are mainly found in the more open country, and are regarded with great reverence. It would not be strange if such were the development of the primitive cromlech, of which there are many to be seen.

The most interesting tomb which we can consider is that of our Lord. As is well known, there is a division of opinion as to its location. From the time of Constantine all have looked to one place, and over this the Crusaders fought and then erected the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. But modern scholars are coming to doubt this place as not fulfilling the conditions of the Gospel narratives, and are favoring the hill just north of the city. Close by its summit stands the ruined church of St. Stephen, and the reasoning, is that if Stephen was put to death there, it was probably the place generally so used. The devout General Gordon found a tomb there which he believed to be the true one, and people in London bought it; but those best able to judge say that it is not old enough, and point to another, the front of which is shown. The question will be settled some time, and it will probably be found that the earliest Christians marked the place by a church, that though disfigured, it might not be wholly destroyed.

The stone which closed such tombs has been found in two specimens, and was a rounded flat stone, which was rolled over the low door and could be sealed by a cord from rock to stone, fastened at the ends with wax and sealed with the procurator's signet; but procurator and stone were no bar to the Resurrection and the Life.

SUNDAY IN THE OLD CHURCH

CHARLES

"The glorious bells their tidings glad"

I
O H, those Sundays in the old church, in the days of long ago,
How pleasantly life's placid stream unruffled used to flow.
My childish soul knew nothing then of "higher criticism,"
Of practices unorthodox and other kinds of schism.
Just simple, childish, lovely faith was all I knew so pure,
Ah sad it is, ah, cruel 'tis, such faith will not endure,
As once it did in those dear days by memory now arrayed,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor preached and prayed.

II
God's day of rest a haven was of quiet and content,
And nature hushed her hum of noise and acquiescence lent;
For nature's God from Sinai had issued his decree,
And holy calm fell down upon the meadow and the lea.
The glorious bells their tidings glad to all the country tolled,
And called belated worshippers to gather in the fold,
And once within that fold secure, no sheep e'er felt afraid,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor preached and prayed.

"And called belated worshippers"

III
No time for ceremonious form, though all was reverent there,
One thought alone pervades the mind, the thought of praise and prayer;
No ranks of surpliced choristers distract the mind and eye,
But each one sang his hymn of praise, and as it rose on high
A glorious, mighty volume, it swept about God's throne,
To blend with angel voices, as though it was their own;
Then rushed with light and gladness hell's darkness to invade,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor preached and prayed.

IV
I see the grand old pastor, with radiant, noble face,
And glorious voice that never tired in telling of the grace
That's waiting for the sinner who will take his load of care,
With a humble and a contrite heart to Christ and leave it there.
Oh blessed words of comfort, yet never half so sweet
As when he gently led you to God's holy mercy seat;
And you saw heaven's gate wide open and its glories
all displayed,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor
preached and prayed.

"As through a glass now darkly" was not the way he saw—
His glass was purest crystal and never knew a flaw;
No clouds were e'er obscuring heaven's wonders from his eyes, [the skies,
For God to him had given the faith that looks beyond

"WE SANG THE OLD HYMNS OVER AND THE PASTOR PREACHED AND PRAYED"

And views the mansions there prepared for such of those who love
To tread the path the Saviour trod and follow him above,
And few indeed, if any, from that narrow pathway
strayed,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor
preached and prayed.

VI
If e'er he condescended to acknowledge doubt or fear,
A splendid sight our pastor then it was to see and hear.
His voice rang like the blast that shook the walls of Jericho,
And unbelief and scoffing pride were routed and laid low;
He towered like a giant, his eyes flashed scorn and fire,

The "God of Battles" came to earth efforts to inspire,
And the hosts of sin and Satan were vanquished and dismayed,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor preached and prayed.

VII
And then the sword avenging, he suddenly would sheath,
His voice to wooing whispers sank, a smile
his face would wreath.
The "God of Battles" disappeared, then came the "God of Love,"
The beauteous Spirit fluttering down semblance of a dove.
Oh, who that heard could then resist the pleading, loving tone,
Oh, who would not take up the Cross and bear it for his own?
Not I, nor you, we heard that voice and willingly obeyed,
Singing soft the old hymns over, as the pastor knelt and prayed.

VIII
Oh would that every church on earth were like the one of old,
And every worn and weary soul at rest within its fold
And would their earthly shepherd and their heavenly Shepherd true
Were like the ones I knew of old and now look heavenward to!
His kingdom then would quickly come again upon the earth,
Mankind with one accord would sing, "One Lord, one Faith, one Birth,"
If we could spread that living grace that always was displayed,
When we sang the old hymns over and the pastor
preached and prayed.

A Sabbath-Keeping Captain

IN these days of frequent Sabbath violation, it is pleasant to hear of some brave and loyal spirit who, rather than desecrate the Lord's Day, is willing to endure hardship and personal sacrifice. A notable instance of Christian loyalty of this character recently came to the attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Capt. Frederick S. Jenks, of Ossining-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., is, or was, until lately, commander of a steamboat plying between Ossining, Nyack, Rockland Lake and Haverstraw. He began the route with the steamer Lewis D. Black in 1892, running only on week days, as he did not believe in carrying on his business on the Lord's Day. Many people remonstrated with him and found fault, but the sturdy Captain told them plainly that if he could not make a living "on the water" in six days out of seven, he would give up his calling and seek other employment. They persisted, and figured out attractive profits for the Captain if he would only run on Sundays, assuring him that the patronage of the pleasure-seekers alone would be equal to thousands of dollars every season, but Capt. Jenks was obdurate, and absolutely declined to entertain any proposition that would involve the desecration of the Lord's Day.

CAPTAIN FREDERICK S. JENKS

He was comparatively poor, and dependent upon his income from his boat for a living; but he remembered the training of his childhood and the words of the commandment: "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy."

In 1898, he sold the Lewis D. Black, and built a larger and handsomer one—the steamer Ossining.
He did not run on Sundays, but, as formerly, contented himself with the week-day trade. Tempting figures were offered him for Sabbath excursions down the Hudson to New York Bay and return; such offers would have netted him from $150 to $200 apiece. The increased expense of running the larger boat was not met by any corresponding increase in income, and Capt. Jenks has chartered her for the present season as a transportation company, which does not use her for Sunday travel. She is a fine steamer, with a carrying capacity of two hundred and seventy-five passengers. Captain Frederick S. Jenks has made considerable sacrifice for principle's sake; but though the fight, in a financial sense was a losing one, involving him in debt, he has faith in God, and believes that "he will bring things out all right in his own good time."

The Family Doctor

NE friend of the family is always sure of a welcome when he answers a call for his visit. A child is taken ill, or the mother is prostrated; there is anxiety about a patient who is raving in delirium; sickness in the home means great solicitude, and the physician is eagerly looked for. He comes in with a cheery face; inscrutable, for he has learned how to control emotion and conceal thought; his very step on the stairs, his gentle, soothing voice, are comforts. When the doctor speaks, we listen; when he issues an order, if we are wise, we obey. No autocrat rules more absolutely, yet none is freer from personal ambition, and more resolute in seeking the good of those whom he serves. It is not an unheard of thing that a physician, who out with his labors, dies in the interest of his fellowmen, and in many ways, less patent than this final sacrifice, his daily life is full of loving self-denial. People often careless in paying the doctor promptly, for by the time his bill is presented, the shadow has been lifted and forgotten. Or, if his patient died, in some misadventure there is resentment against the doctor whose remedies failed. Doctors' wives and daughters are properly indignant at the dribbling manner in which bills are settled, and they make no secret of their feelings of this very common injustice. There is a reason why we should delay in paying the account of a friend, who, in our extremity, has done what he could to save us, and, as equally with landlord, and butcher, and baker, and grocer, the doctor must live; as he must bring up his children, educate and start them in life, and take his place in the community as a good citizen, his clients should never punish him to inconvenience by their tardiness. This is the more imperative, because doctors seldom dun their patients and are fastidiously delicate in pressing the claims.

Aunt Mandy's Farming

Aunt Mandy's boys are working on a farby farm, and her "old man" is rated "no account" in the colloquial of the country-side. But the old woman is strong and energetic, and if there is ploughing to be done, she is quite equal to the occasion. These great oxen are very good and they work as well at a woman's bidding as a man's. If there is a crop raised on this little Georgia farm, it is May who will raise it. Old Jake is one of those people who were born tired, and it is a happy dispensation of Providence that one of that variety usually mate with the opposites. A law of contrast works in the moral and mental domain as in the physical, where we have all observed that the short man chooses a very tall wife, and vice versa.

We are apt to pity a woman who is obliged to work in the open air, but for my part, I commiserate much more the person who is shut up in a small kitchen over a red-hot stove, than she who does some share of the farm-labor in the sweet fields and under the open sky.

Jess, Lover of My Soul

How often we sing the dear hymn which begins with this familiar line, and perhaps we think of Charles Wesley, who was inspired to write it while gazing on a tempest from the security of his home. But in the storms of life, when the winds are contrary, what is so safe and so sweet a haven as this thought of Jesus? Jesus the altogether lovely, the chief among ten thousand, Jesus, of whom we can say, My beloved is mine and am his. Jesus, who says, Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man open to me I will come in and sup with him and he with me.

Art thou weary, art thou languid,
Art thou sore oppressed?
"Come to Me," saith one, and "coming,
Be at rest."

Our friends may tire of us. Jesus, never. Others may be unable to lift our burdens, Jesus always can help, and his sweet word is, Let not your heart be troubled. We love him according to our measure. He loves us according to his. So, his patience is inexhaustible, his mercies are ever new, and his goodness surpasses our power of comprehension.

Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll,
While the tempest still is high.

Picnic Hints

Everything that can be arranged for a picnic should be attended to the night before, if you are to make an early start. For instance, plan the route which you will take, and make sure of your conveyances, and also of the friends who are going. Sandwiches will not be injured if they are cut and packed tightly in a cool place. The crust cut from each thin slice of bread and butter and the filling made of ham minced finely, or of hard-boiled eggs, beaten to a paste. Brown bread and cream cheese make very nice sandwiches, and peanut butter is much relished by children, being nutritious as well as palatable. The loaf cake and the smaller cakes should be made the day before a picnic. Berries, if taken, must be carefully picked; jellies and jams carried in small covered glasses. Fruit is excellent for a picnic luncheon, but pies are apt to be messy, and therefore less appetizing. Lemonade taken in bottles, tightly corked, and cold tea, are popular as beverages, and if there is the chance to make a fire, coffee brewed out of doors has a gypsy flavor which most people like. Japanese paper napkins are very dainty, and may be burned up when a meal is over; birch-bark platters furnish a good substitute for china, and aluminum spoons are, for picnic purposes, preferable to silver, as being inexpensive, it does not vary much matter if one or two are lost.

GO NOT TOO FAR

Go not too far in the land of light,
A little while by the golden gate,
Lest that I lose you out of sight,
Wait, my darling, wait.

Forever now from your happy eyes
Life's scenic picture has passed away,
You have entered into realities,
And I am yet at the play.

But the last sad act is drawing on;
A little while by the garden gate,
Of the holy heaven to which you are gone,
Wait, my darling, wait. —ALICE CARY.

Hot Weather Ethics and Hints

HOW to keep cool in the tropical midsummer temperature which annually visits us, is the problem we have to solve. Sometimes, when the mercury mounts to the top of the tube, the thing is almost a physical impossibility, but if we can keep from worrying and fretting at the heat, if inwardly we can retain our peace and coolness, we shall somewhat reduce our sufferings. Every one has noticed that those feel the heat less who are busy and who keep right on with their work, than those who are idle and have time to fuss and fan and complain. It is an open question whether fanning does not make one warmer than one would be if forgetful of the need of a fan. For example, the person who has an important engagement which must be kept, does not fume, as does the other person who is lounging and lounging about, declaring that never since the world began was there known a summer so fiercely hot, so fearfully insupportable.

We should borrow some suggestions from India, and, in very hot weather, rise very early. There is an exquisite moment in the early dawn, when the air is fresh and the sun has not yet gained its later force. Then, the early riser may read, work, or do what she will, having taken a light breakfast first, and then the house may be filled with the pure morning air, every window and door opened to the fragrance of the dew-wet flowers. Open windows at top and bottom both. If you have screens, be sure that some of them are arranged for the upper part of the window as well as for the lower. When the sun is high, shut and darken the house. Close doors and windows, and keep out the heated atmosphere through the day, opening them again in the late afternoon.

Iced tea and iced coffee are more refreshing than the same beverages in a hot state, except at breakfast, during the summer. A great stone pitcher of iced lemonade should be kept in every house, and freely used when wanted. Iced water should be taken rather sparingly, though water chilled by being kept near the ice may be freely used by the thirsty. Doctors advise people to drink a good deal of water in hot weather. It is indeed a little doubtful whether we ought not always to drink more water than we do.

Bathing twice a day is advisable during a heated term. Children should often be sponged off, and always before going to bed they should have the comfort of a bath.

Avoid the direct rays of the sun, and postpone expeditions which are not necessary until a less burning season arrives. For example, the lady who has a day's shopping to do may as well defer it until the heat moderates. And those who do go to the stores should be as inexacting and give as little trouble as possible to the clerks and saleswomen. These people are tired, and if, occasionally, they are a bit irritable or absent-minded, they should be pardoned. Most of us, if thoughtful, can lighten the load of our fellow creatures in the business world in little ways, such as finishing our shopping in good season, and not prolonging it until the extreme limit of the day, when the closing hour brings the clerk the need of finishing up her work and leaving her stock in order, and by being easily pleased and not too slow in making up our minds.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MINNIE MAURICE. Cosmetics should be avoided. Keep in good health, and bathe freely, and your skin will be clear.

—COUSIN SUTIE. There is no harm in helping your young cousin in his home study.

—AUNTIE. An aunt should not take the reins of government out of a mother's hands.

—SERMON AMBERG. Remember Jesus Christ, by Robert E. Speer, is an admirable book for young Christians.

—S. S. SECRETARY. The verbal report at the close of a session should be brief. Tell the number of teachers and officers present, the number of scholars, and the amount of the offering.

—GRANDMA MARSH. I am sure that you believe with me in early training the children in the way they should go. They should be taught to pray and to read the Bible daily, should memorize the text of God's Word and go regularly to Sunday School and church. Then we should set them a Christian example.

—R. Familiarities of the kind you describe between young people are in very bad taste. A young lady may visit in the home of a man friend if she is a friend of his home people. She need not avoid the hours when he is at home. A girl would better not marry until she is twenty, but there is no rule against her earlier marriage.

—MOURNER. Your case is not uncommon. We are apt to vex ourselves with vain regrets when our dear ones are taken. You probably did the best you knew how to do while your husband was here. If anything was left undone, he knows all about it now, and loves you just the same. Surely God forgives all the sins of which we repent.

PATRIARCHAL FAITH

Abraham's Dependence on God for the Fulfillment of the Promise

By MRS. M. BAXTER

EVERY overture to the world, on the part of one who knows God, is like another mesh of the net which is surely being woven to entangle him. The territory of the prince of this world is closely watched; nothing happens in his dominions without his knowledge, and he knows how to make use of the proximity of men who fear God. Enmity, strife, discord; all had their origin with him, and he won the advantage he might gain if the new of the man of faith whom God had chosen, should be involved in a war between the king of Sodom and his enemies.

As he stirred up against Sodom a confederate army of neighboring kings, who, after reducing Sodom and her allies to tribute for twelve years, after which they rebelled, came against them with overwhelming force, and desolated the country, taking away all the goods of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the surrounding country. Lot, who seems to have taken no part in the conflict, was taken away prisoner, and the goods to which his heart had clung were confiscated. Poor Lot! he must learn how he had miscalculated in thinking he was better off in securing his own interests than in gaining with his uncle, who had learned to trust Jehovah. The man of the world was prisoner, and penniless, and the man of faith came to his succor. What a lesson! Abraham no sooner heard of the misfortune of Lot than he armed his servants and went to rescue of his nephew. God was with him and he prevailed. Abraham brought back with him "all the goods" (Gen. 14: 16), as well as all his household. Lot must now receive back from his disinterested uncle, who walked before God, that which his greedy hands had grasped for himself. It is even we have learned to trust God with our own needs that God often enables us to help those who have taken advantage of us. The king of Sodom wanted to share the spoil with him. Abraham had learned his lesson, and absolutely refused to benefit by one who sinned against the Lord exceedingly. "I have lifted up mine hand," he said, "unto the Lord God Most High, Possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread to a shoe-latchet, nor any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldst say, I have made Abram rich." Would that such a fear were in every church and in every mission at this time! Corruption creeps into the churches, and into many Christian works, through the miserable unbending which goes down to Egypt for help, instead of trusting in the living God. Worldly methods want a return for their money, and they give to a work of God, they want to have a hand in it: to make it great before the eyes of the world; to make it pay a financial transaction, and thus no root is left for dependence upon God. He is set out, the Spirit is grieved; the work is hindered because the world and the ungodly are making the Church rich. What is the meaning of so many churches and institutions being so constantly in want of money? They are not answering their purpose to prove that God is the living God, who comes to the help of those that trust in him. Would it not be easy for God to stop the hearts, and make the money flow, if by his children trusted him and sought his honor.

After these things Abram was again visited with one of those wondrous times of God's nearness, in which he specially makes himself known to his own. It was in a vision that the Lord came unto Abram, and said: "Fear not, Abram. I am thy Shield, and exceeding great Reward." (Gen. 15: 1). It was a blessed, precious revelation. "As he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be." There was no planation, no word as to when or how, no perfect answer to his question, but an added assurance from him who cannot lie. And, without understanding any more than before, Abram honored his God; for he believed God and God honored Abram; for "he counted to him for righteousness." It was on this occasion that God constituted him "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4: 11). Abram did not insist on any explanation; because he did believe, he did count God true, therefore he could wait for God to develop his plan. Real faith can always wait, and wait in the dark. Unbelief is always in a hurry and restless, not really believing God can and will bring his word to pass, unless some outward sign of it is to be seen.

Again God repeats to Abram his promise of the land. And Abram puts another question: "O Lord Jehovah, how shall I know that thou shalt inherit it?" And God came down to his servant's weakness, and directed him to slay a lamb, a turtle dove and a pigeon, and divide them in the midst. This was the form of a covenant in those days, and even till the time of Jeremiah, when Zedekiah made such a covenant with Nebuchadnezzar. When it was night, God himself, under the figure of "a smoking furnace" and a flaming torch, passed between the halves of the creatures slain (Gen. 15: 17), and Abraham knew that his God had bound himself. But before this ratification of God's promise and covenant, "a deep sleep fell upon Abram," and God revealed to him the future of his people: how they would be "strangers in a land that was not theirs," and be "afflicted four hundred years," and afterwards they should come out, not penniless, after all their suffering, but "with great substance." For, added the sacred writer, "the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full."

While, in all ages, God's children are passing through examinations in his school, through humiliations and suffering, the rebellious are ripening for judgment. But God is in no hurry to destroy. He alone knows the moment when sin is come to the full, and when it would be no longer righteous to forgive. In the time of Noah, God could afford to give the wicked inhabitants of the earth one hundred and twenty-five years of warning before he finally destroyed them. The Amorites, in Canaan, should have four hundred years yet, in which they might have an opportunity to break off their sins.

God thus showed to the patriarch Abram his purposes for his chosen people, and at the same time his coming judgments upon the wicked. And he then told them what should be the limits of the land of promise, from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates, such will be the future land of Israel.

AT EVENING TIME

"AT evening time, there shall be light."
How oft I've read these blessed words,
And wondered, Were they meant for me?
Shall I, who walk in darkness now,
The blessed light at evening see?

"At evening time, there shall be light."
Help me, O Lord, to trust these words
By prophet spoke, in ages past,
And walk by faith, through darkness here,
Sure of the evening bright at last.

"At evening time, there shall be light."
Let this sweet promise, my dear Lord,
Like Bethlehem's Star, my sure guide be,
Till at the evening's bursting light,
The far off gates of pearl I see.

Called Away

Mrs. Mary Weekes, who died at Capitola, Calif., lately, was a most exemplary Christian and left a beautiful testimony. Her language and demeanor in the last hours of life, showed her firm faith and confidence in God's goodness and mercy. She was born in London, Eng., in 1821, and was a Christian nearly sixty-six years.

The death of Mr. John Ward, a native of Stan-brook, Durham, Eng., is announced. He passed away at Victoria, B. C., June 26, in his eighty-fifth year. He was a true Christian, and had served the Master during a long and useful lifetime.

THE JEWS TO RETURN*

Negotiations with the Sultan for a Lease of the Holy Land to the Jews

NEWS comes from Constantinople that Dr. Herzl, the leader of the movement for the colonization of Palestine, has had a long audience with the Sultan in his palace. Official etiquette forbids the disclosure of the nature and result of the interview, but it was remarked that Dr. Herzl, on leaving the palace, seemed to be in excellent spirits. His bearing, as an observer said, was that of one who had come measurably nearer to the realization of a long cherished hope. The fact that the Sultan had consented to see Dr. Herzl at all, is an augury of no slight importance. There was a fear that the Sultan would refuse to listen to any proposal looking to the settlement of the Jews in their own land. It would appear now, however, that he is willing to consider the project. So much may be inferred from his granting an audience to a man whose business he must have clearly understood before seeing him.

The student of prophecy will perceive at once the significance of the event. When the Holy Land is once again peopled by the descendants of Abraham, the long suspension in the progress of the fulfilment of prophecy—the hiatus between the sixty-ninth and seventieth week of the revelation to Daniel (Daniel 9: 25-27) will be closed, and the stream of prophetic history will pass swiftly forward to the seven years preceding the final consummation.

In an address before a recent meeting in London, reported in the Prophetic News,* Rev. R. M. Hawkins called attention to the Zionist movement as one of the most significant signs of the times. He said in the course of his address:

"Four years ago, one might have felt hesitation to speak of a Jewish nation, fearing to appear ridiculous. To-day, he makes himself ridiculous who denies the existence of the Jewish nation. Is not this awakening of the Jewish nation, after a sleep of so many centuries, a marvelous sign of the times, and an augury of the fulfilment of Ezekiel 37: 21, 22: 'Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and I will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more?'

"Though many Zionists would exclude the religious element, the Zionist medal is a standing witness that the sacredness of a Covenant relationship is claiming recognition. The angel on the one side, representing 'the national idea,' and pointing Eastward, where the sunrise heralds the coming day. On the other side: 'Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land' (Ezekiel 37: 21), is surely a recognition not only that the movement is of God, but is in direct fulfilment of his Word.

"As the anti-Semitic forces on the one hand and the Zionist movement on the other gather strength, it behooves us to watch the concurrent movements of the nations with whom the Jewish nation is brought in contact, especially those of Russia, pointed at in Ezekiel 38 and 39, and of Turkey, as the Gentile power under whose heel at the present time Jerusalem is trodden down."

"Concurrently with all these signs, we mark the attitude of the Jewish mind and of the Jewish authorities towards the personality of Jesus of Nazareth, as being altogether different from a few years ago. In many cases, rabbis and Jewish professors are arranging that the history of Jesus Christ shall be taught to the children in Jewish Sabbath Schools."

A New Feature in Gospel Work

ILLUSTRATED musicals, as given by Prof. E. C. Millard, of Maysville, O., form a new and attractive feature in evangelical work. The Professor, is a fine tenor soloist, whose enunciation in singing is so clear and distinct that every word can be understood. He uses the stereopticon in Gospel meetings, and beautiful dissolving views thrown upon a screen illustrate the songs he sings. The pictures are the work of his brush, hence he brings to the Master's service the tribute of art as well as of music. In Washington, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Des Moines, Fort Worth and other large cities, he has done great good as soloist and chorus conductor in revival meetings. He is a member of the Maysville Church of the Disciples, of which Rev. H. S. Gilliam is pastor, and his first work was for that church, but now, as song and art evangelist, he is ready to aid all denominations in bringing the sinful and sorrowful to Christ.

An Interesting Magazine

The People, The Land and The Book, deals exclusively with God's ancient people, the Jews. In prose and in poem, this scholarly quarterly comes to its readers in a most instructive and interesting manner. It is a radical departure from the customary, old-fashioned Hebrew-Christian publication. Its object is to break down the barriers of prejudice existing between Jews and Gentiles. For this reason alone it recommends itself heartily to all who are desirous to have intelligent and unbiased information regarding the Jewish people. An idea can be had from the contents of this illustrated quarterly, by perusing the articles of eminent English divines, such as National Characteristic of the Jews, by Rev. F. A. Cox, D.D., LL.D. The Destination of the Jews, by Rev. James Hamilton D.D., and The Dispersion of the Jews, by Rev. T. Archer, D.D. The Everlasting Nation, by Rev. Ad. Saphir D.D. Zionism is treated fully. The Yiddish Press and Literature in the United States is treated by a Hebrew in a most excellent article. Each number contains choicest selections from the Talmud. The serial, Meier Ezofovitch, by a Protestant Countess, is a feature of every number of the quarterly. Each number brings a selection of Jewish music and text, such as "The Wandering Jew," and a "Jewish Lullaby," music of interest to every lover of ancient tunes. The People, The Land and The Book, is warmly praised for its scholarship and unique interest by Bishop J. N. Fitzgerald, Mrs. Margaret Bottome, and many others. The subscription price is $1.00 per year. It is published at No. 436 Carlton Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

IRRIGATION IN INDIA

A committee of scientific men, and men familiar with the conditions of the climate in India, has been organized in England to devise measures for preventing the recurrence of famine. An enlightened system of irrigation is being prepared, which, it is hoped, will utilize the water of the rivers now flowing uselessly to the sea. It is asserted by civil engineers that enough water runs through the country to water the whole of India. Immense sums of money would, however, be needed to construct reservoirs and dig channels.

SAVING BOY CRIMINALS

BY REV. J. J. MUNRO
Chaplain of the Tombs

CHAPLAIN MUNRO'S CLASS OF BOY CRIMINALS IN THE TOMBS

EVERY year the Police Authorities of Manhattan and Bronx arrest at least 5,000 boys and girls upon charges which embrace almost every crime on the calendar. When we think of the densely populated sections of the city, where children literally live in the streets, and where the multiplication of evil resorts, such as saloons, gambling-hells, pool shops and other places tempt even the very young to drinking and carousing, it is only wonder is that more do not go astray. Sad to say, some of the toughest and most daring criminals in this city are found among its juvenile offenders. Delinquents under sixteen years of age are given to the Gerry Society; those over sixteen and under twenty are sent to the Tombs, where they are domiciled in what is known as the Boys' Prison. Thus it is seen that boys who are sent to the Tombs are not thrown with the old criminals, but are kept by themselves. The Boys' Prison is in no sense a reformatory; it is merely a place of detention where youths, presumed to be innocent until found guilty, await the disposition of the courts; yet during such detention, opportunities to reach and influence them are given to Christian workers.

The large foreign population of New York, and the dense ignorance of those who come from the Slavic and Latin races, is constantly in evidence in the criminal records of the city. As nearly as I remember, about forty per cent. of the offenders are of foreign birth; sixty per cent. of foreign parentage, and about twenty per cent. are of American birth and parentage. On admittance to prison, some become stolidly indifferent to surroundings, and for a time despair takes the place of hope. Again, they are suspicious, a feeling that everybody is against them. I have found from experience that a new Christian Herald, or a good, bright book, often acts like a charm with such boys. The pictures make a wonderful impression upon them. A basis for conversation is established, and soon we are able to win their confidence. Then, step by step, we unfold the way whereby a boy may live for God and enjoy blessed communion with him.

I have visited many prisons in different parts of the land, and have met and talked with boys and young men of every social condition and temperament. The following is a typical interview, and shows some of the reasons why boys go astray: "Henny, how are you to-day?" I ask of a youthful recruit to prison ranks, while I note my rounds. He replies: "I ain't doing well." "What brought you here, boy?" He hangs his head in shame, and gives no answer. "How old are you?" "Only sixteen past." "Are your parents living?" "Mother has been dead since I was six years old." Think of it! A boy without a mother, growing up in a great city. On further investigation, I find that his father was a drinking man, and the boy has been under no religious influence since his mother died. His only playground has been the street, his comrades other children of the tenements, with whom he learned much of evil and little of good.

One day I found a chubby, honest-faced German boy behind the bars. He had come alone from the Fatherland when twelve years old, to his uncle, a farmer in a Western state. In his new home, the uncle made him work like a slave, giving him no opportunity for either secular or religious education. Herman stood it a few years and then ran away. He worked his way East by stealing rides on freight trains. He would have died of starvation on the way had not train hands, to whom he told his tale of adventure, taken pity on him and generously shared their food with him. They smuggled him over the different roads until he got to New York, where he wandered around looking for work, but finding none. Unfortunately, he was discovered one night in company with two young thieves, and was arrested on suspicion. He lay in prison several weeks. After a thorough investigation we were able to show that he was an honest boy. Before going out, I gave him a note to a Y. M. C. A. worker, who provided him with clothing, food, and a lodging for two weeks, and then secured work for him. Some months later I found Herman in a Mission settlement as one of the workers. He was clean and neatly dressed. What a transformation had taken place in the dirty, ragged little tramp! The Gospel of Jesus Christ had wrought the miracle.

Sometimes I find boys in prison who have run away from home and who are the same as lost or dead to their parents. I write at once to father or mother, and inform them where their boy may be found. Most of them are glad to get the lads home again. I regret to say, however, more than once I have found unnatural parents who did not care where their boys were. One little fellow, with tears in his eyes, asked me to go and tell his mother to come and take him out of prison. I called upon the woman, who kept a beer saloon on the East side. She said she did not want the boy home, and would not lift her finger to save him.

I find down deep in every boy's heart a tender spot that can be touched by the grace of God. It should be the supreme aim of the Prison Chaplain to fill the minds of these poor young jail-birds with the good seeds of Gospel truth. Not only should there be religious teaching in prison, but practical morality should be taught in such a way as to form good habits.

Many of these prison lads are barely able to read and write; of American history the majority know little or nothing. Ask some of them "Who discovered America?" and it's more than likely they will answer you, "Benjamin Franklin"; or, "Who came over in the Mayflower?" and some one may reply "George Washington"; "Who is Governor of New York?" "Tim Sullivan," or give any other ridiculous answer. It is hardly creditable that in this enlightened city, with its churches, chapels and schools of learning, there are thousands of boys and young men who know absolutely nothing whatever of God, or his Son Jesus Christ, and who are as densely ignorant of the Bible as they are of the Koran. The vast majority of these never enter a church or Sunday School, and they certainly receive no religious training at home. To many of them the name of God is known only to be blasphemed. Standing before a class of forty to fifty of these boys, I have asked the simplest of Bible questions, such as any five-year-old child ought to be able to answer, but none could reply. For example, I have asked them to tell me how many Gospels are there? The names of the four evangelists? or whether the twenty-third psalm and the ten commandments are found in the Old or New Testament? and they could not answer to save their lives.

Soul-Winning at Des Moines

A Notable Gospel Campaign in which Many were Drawn to Christ

THE University Place Church of Christ, Des Moines, Iowa, has lately experienced a marked spiritual revival. The church had, at the beginning of the meetings, 1,770 members, and, as a body, was in a healthy spiritual condition, and anxious to enter into a vigorous soul-winning campaign. The church territory is divided into four districts, or wards, in each of which there are four elders, eight deacons, and six deaconesses, who look after the spiritual and temporal welfare of the membership and people within these wards. For this campaign there were added to these committees on advertising, special devotions, finances, personal work, and ushers. Special cards were issued at intervals during the progress of the meetings, announcing special subjects, which kept alive the interest.

The personal workers met in earnest prayer each day at the church and at the University hard by. Persons interested were visited and the plan of work talked over. A great majority of the converts decided in their homes and at their rooms to confess Christ, and did so publicly the evening following, when the Gospel sermon was preached and the invitation given by Evangelist Scoville. So efficiently was this work done that a list of such persons made out daily was largely verified by the responses that were made at the evening services.

Large audiences attended. The total number confessing Christ and presenting letters for admission to membership in this church through the seven weeks of the meetings was 573. Of this number, 160 were students of Drake University. These make a total membership of the church now 2,343.

PROPER FOOD.

Nature's Way to Regain Health.

A man may try all sorts of drugs to help him get well, but after all proper food is the method intended by nature.

Anyone can prove the efficacy of this by making use of the following breakfast each morning for fifteen or twenty days:

A dish containing not more than four heaping teaspoonsfuls of Grape-Nuts, enough good, rich cream to go with them, some raw or cooked fruit, not more than two slices of entire wheat bread, and not more than one cup of Postum Food Coffee, to be sipped, not drank hurriedly. Let this suffice for the breakfast.

Let one meal in the day consist of an abundance of good meat, potato and one other vegetable.

The method will quickly prove the value of the selection of the right kind of food to rebuild the body and replace the lost tissue which is destroyed every day and must be made up, or disease of some sort enters in. This is an age of specialists, and the above suggestions are given by a specialist in food values, dietetics and hygiene.

SAVED WHILE HELPING OTHERS

How Professor J. W. Magruder, of Delaware, Ohio, Found Christ

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

It is certainly a sufficient answer to the sneer of the infidel, that Christianity belongs to the age of ignorance and superstition, and will gradually disappear with the growth of intelligence and education, to note, that undeniable statistics show, that, while only one-twentieth of the young men in the United States are avowed professing Christians, one-third of all the graduates of colleges among young men in this country are outspoken Christians. Surely there is something very striking and very significant in that fact.

There is another suggestion in this fact, however, and that is, that a man's conversion to Christ is often a regeneration of mind as well as of heart. Some of the noblest thinkers and most famous scholars in this country would never have had an education, and would never have cared for an education, if it had not been that when the conscience was aroused, and they became earnest Christians, they had a longing aroused in them to make the most of themselves, and to consecrate all their powers to their divine Lord.

One of the most heroic soul-savers ever known among American college men, was the late Rev. Dr. Charles H. Payne, who, after a most remarkable career as a pastor in large churches in the leading Eastern cities, became a college president at Delaware, Ohio, and was there a fountain of inspiration to young men. Professor Magruder, who himself won peculiar fame in the city of Cincinnati in dealing with the problem of a downtown church, before going back to his Alma Mater as a professor, says that he, with hundreds of other young men, owes Charles H. Payne an eternal debt of gratitude for opening their eyes to Christianity as something more than "a religion to die by," and kindling their enthusiasm for a life of heroic self-sacrifice for the kingdom of God on earth.

It was in young Magruder's junior year in college that the crisis in his life came. He had joined the church in his boyhood, but had not entered into fellowship with Christ, nor received the witness of the Spirit, and during these years, at least eight of them, he had been more or less earnestly seeking after God. Again and again, in revival meetings, he had gone forward to the altar, in response to invitations to be prayed for. All of the ordinary means of grace he had availed himself of, and so far as he was concerned, they had all been weighed in the balance and found wanting. He went into St. Paul's Church, Delaware, Ohio, one night, convinced, that however much of virtue might be in a Methodist altar for others, it had no efficacy for him; his only hope of salvation was in going to work for the saving of others. Opposite to him sat a student who had the unenviable reputation of being the toughest man in the junior class, to which Magruder belonged. He resolved to go for him. The young fellow knew enough about Magruder to be surprised at his coming, and said: "Why, are you a Christian?"

"No, I am not," said Magruder.
"Well, then, why do you come for me?"
"Because you need it and so do I," was the reply. "Come along!"

And "the toughest man in the class" got up and went with him, and his chum, who was sitting by him, followed close behind. Kneeling with them, Magruder explained as well as he could in the way it had been explained to him, how to become a Christian. Both the young men were converted, but Magruder rose from the altar, as he then believed, unsaved. Since then he has come to doubt this, and now believes that on that night, when he had such a desire to lead others to Christ, and really did lead his two classmates to the altar, he was himself converted, if by conversion is meant "a facing-about," for he undoubtedly at that time turned definitely from darkness into light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Still, there was no joy in his heart, and the gladness of salvation had not come to him.

Next night, as he entered the church, he made a resolution that he would not quit the church until he had found the "witness of the Spirit." The revelation came sooner than he expected. He had become so used to struggle and effort, that it did not occur to him that it could come in any other way. But during the pastor's sermon, on "Watch, therefore, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh," there dawned upon him, like the coming of the morning, "the light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world." And from that day, Magruder has walked in the light, and has been like a city set upon a hill, or a light flashing from a lofty candlestick, that not only cannot be hid, but gives light to all about him.

A Story of Missionary Heroism

Dear "Christian Herald":

In an old number of your paper, arrived at this distant part of earth on rather a recent date, we saw mention made of your proposed "Medal for Heroism," which set certain of our little company of Americans here to reflecting on what they had come through for the Master's sake, more especially at Erzroum, under war, famine and pestilence, in 1877 and 1878. Though they have no thought of being competitors for your prize medal, it may seem appropriate that some facts—often stranger than fiction—should be brought to the light, in justice to the cause they represented in the land.

Though they now hail from B., 170 miles further south than Erzroum, and went through such scenes and bloody orgies here in 1895 as try the metal of one, the scene had especially in mind was laid at E. during their sixteen years there. There, in regions nearer to Mt. Ararat, they went through what outsiders can never understand fully, and it took fast hold of their memory, though it is nearing seventeen years since they left those surroundings to make their home in Bitlis.

The close siege of Erzroum is about being accomplished by the Russians at the close of 1877. Outside roads have been so cut that breadstuffs have gone up to five times their usual prices, and starvation stalks abroad in ghastly form. A parent had advertised the sale of his child upon the church door, in hope that the proceeds would help to keep others of the family alive for a time! Tender-hearted foreigners could not brook this state of things, so started up relief work in a small way, and mostly on faith, as funds are not in hand for it. The late heroic Nebraska girl, Miss Nicholson, bravely stands by them in this effort for humanity; but unprecedented odds are against them on every hand. Russians and Turks are crossing swords at the border, reaching on to Mt. Ararat, and already wounded soldiers are arriving, on springless carts, from the front in most destitute condition. With neither doctors nor surgeons at hand, what should the Yankee do but set to work to bring order out of the general confusion, and aim at something bordering on comfort for the neglected ones. Later, English surgeons begin to arrive on the scene, but who shall go up with them upon the field of battle, or stand by them in hospital to interpret and help in other ways preparatory to turning over what might be said to be the American hospital to English hands, save that same plucky Granite Stater. But another serious matter confronted the little colony. The English Consul, acting for them also in a civil capacity, is ordered away from his post, and he advises them to leave as well. "No," said they; "we cannot leave our charge; no John Bull has ordered us away—ours is a higher commission, and we must not desert our post." And they did not—even defenceless as they were, with no consul. In this last, however, it was seen that man's extremity was God's opportunity, for officers, both on the Turkish and Russian side, were very friendly and kind. But, alas! the despoiler is from within. Pestilence is making havoc, both in town and the armies. The only man of the Americans took out his war indemnity most likely by bringing home the disease from his hospital work. Though they were seven (including the lamented Miss Nicholson), only three came through the dark experience, while only one of those escaped the fell disease. This much as a glance of what some of your watchmen upon the walls at the front are not infrequently called to pass through for the Master's sake.

"Numbness of the hands and arms, with premonitions of paralysis, kept by me I was using coffee. I finally discovered was caused by coffee; when I quit the and began drinking Postum Food Coffee numbness ceased entirely and I have very well ever since. At that time I was unable to sleep, but now I sleep perfectly."

Husband was also troubled from lack of sleep while he was drinking coffee, but he uses Postum Food Coffee with me and we both sleep perfectly. Our little boy had peculiar nervous spells and I stopped the of coffee with him and have been giving him all the Postum Food Coffee he cared for is perfectly well now.

My sister was troubled with nervous aches while she used coffee. She found greatly improved we were from discontinuing it and using Postum Food Coffee, she made the change, and is now rid of her headaches. We are naturally strong advocates of Postum." Mrs. J. Walford, Canfield, Erie Co., Ohio.

of the human race swept over him as he gazed fascinated on the strange picture, and the sounds of the street, the hurrying to and fro of feet in the outer corridors died on his ears. While he looked into the wonderful eyes that literally seemed to speak to him. Unheeding he gazed until the breeze fluttered the thin sheet of paper in the enclosure at his feet. He stooped and picked it up and read words that made his heart swell—the innocent, untutored expressions of a grateful child:

"I thank you very much, my good, kind friend, my godfather," the letter concluded. "I go to School and try to learn so that I can be a Teacher. I love you and I will pray for you. HARNNA."

A strange thrill went through Dudley Wayne, and he felt the blood hot in his cheeks. And this child said she loved him and would pray for him! He looked at the photograph, and as the eyes once met his they filled with tears. He realized that the great tie of human kinship bound him to this child in India as surely as though she were his own flesh and blood. With deep warmth of feeling, he already looked into the future and planned for her a superior education, advantages, all that wealth could place at her disposal; and then a voice sounded at his elbow, and Jack Thompson said, laughing: "Hello, Dudley! It's that sort of thing, is it? No wonder your boy wouldn't let me in. I let myself in."

Dudley Wayne was not a man to be unduly joked with, and he promptly turned on his friend: "This sort of thing, as you call it, would be a good thing for you too, Jack. I'm glad you came in. This is my orphan ward, little Harnna, in India. She is being educated in a mission school there at my expense, if you can call fifteen dollars a year expense, for that is all it costs. And look at her! Look at those eyes; see the intelligence in that face—and if it were not for my paltry fifteen dollars she might have starved to death like thousands of others. Why, when I think of the money I make here and of the thousands I spend on my own pleasure, I can hardly believe that so small a sum has saved a human being from starvation!"

He spoke with a certain fire that impressed his friend with his seriousness. He scanned the photograph and said: "She's a dear little child sure enough, but I must say I hadn't suspected you of carrying on a private philanthropy for your own amusement. How in the world did you ever find out about starving children in India, and this one in particular?"

Then it was that the tape ticked madly for awhile unheeded while Wayne told the story of how he had become interested, a story which, strangely enough, seemed to interest Thompson as much as it did him. Up to the arrival of the mail that morning he told it, and concluded: "And now she's my little orphan." Thompson laughed good naturedly: "Well, old man, I declare you've really done a good thing, if I'm any judge; but it strikes me that she isn't as much of an orphan as you seem to think, with this interest you're taking in her."

"Maybe not, Jack, I'm willing to stand in loco parentis, and, by the way, why not try it yourself?"

"Not just yet," said Thompson, waving off the suggestion. "I'll have to keep an eye on you and your protegee for awhile and see how you turn out. But now, Dudley, for goodness sake tell me what you think about this new steel trust?"

That was the beginning of a new era for Dudley Wayne. He kept the photograph on his desk, and every morning the sweet eyes smiled a welcome at him. His fellow-workers speedily knew the story, and the widening circles spread rapidly. Within a month Jack Thompson had an orphan, and when the photograph of a bright-eyed boy came to him with an oddly spelled letter, he rushed to Dudley with it like a schoolboy and they compared notes with deep satisfaction.

Somehow that idea spread, after awhile it got to almost a fad in a circle of active business men, and they signed checks for those small fifteen dollars, and laughed, and discussed the comparative merits of their little orphans over many a luncheon and many a dinner; but laugh though they might, every man of them felt a deep and tender interest in those little orphans. Within six months twenty more were provided for, and the rivalry grew until each man was ready to argue in favor of his particular protegee. Then one evening, as they sat over their after-dinner coffee, Jack Thompson turned to Wayne and said: "You've made some good deals lately, Wayne, and after all fifteen dollars a year will leave you a fair margin for your ocean trip and the cottage in the Adirondacks."

Dudley Wayne did not answer for a moment, then he looked up and said, slowly and deliberately:

"I may or may not have the trip or the cottage, Jack, but I know one thing, and that is that less than a year ago, when I made my first $100,000, I wondered what I could do with it to get real happiness out of it, and I found out with exactly fifteen dollars. It doesn't make any difference what I do with the rest of it now."

In the silence that fell, every man felt a real and deep happiness away down in his heart, and the tie of the brotherhood of man vibrated all the way from India to New York.

A Pillow Saint

"WHEN our Ladies' Aid Society meets at Mrs. Cooke's, I never miss attending it," said a benevolent lady to a friend a few days ago. Mrs. Bella Cooke is the sufferer, who hasn't been outside of her bedroom since 1857, but who, all the same, is one of the busiest members of the Rose Hill Methodist Church, the church to which Emma Abbott left $5,000 because she had received so much spiritual benefit there. Well, if ever Emma Abbott found time to make a visit to Mrs. Cooke, she received as much spiritual benefit in that sick-room in a rear tenement, on Second avenue, as she ever did in church. Yes, it was as far back as 1857 that Mrs. Cooke received what might be called a life sentence, but she is the most cheerful "lifer" that anybody ever saw, and she is the leading spirit in all the work of the church. If it is a fair, she knows what is best to offer for sale at it, and that without having been inside of a store within an ordinary lifetime. If there's trouble of any kind in the church, she is the first to see the way out of it, and she is helpfulness itself where there is any worthy person in need.

She bears her affliction with fortitude, cheerfulness and patience. She does not love to be pitied. Think of how many times she must have heard her helplessness spoken of in the last forty-four years! She, herself, is ready to jest about her bedridden condition. At a meeting of the Ladies' Aid Society when a fair was in contemplation, some one proposed putting Mrs. Bella Cooke on the Purchasing Committee, whereupon she replied: "I should be glad to serve, my dear, but I have neither hat nor shoes."

"Nor a dress, I suppose," added one of her listeners.

"Yes, I have a dress," she replied, smiling. "A nice white silk dress, and you will all see me in it at church one of these days, when I shall be taken there in my coffin."

I know that all present, except Mrs. Cooke herself, hoped that that white silk might be yellow with age long before it would be needed. CLARA MARSHALL.

GOD'S CHILDREN

ON the sad and the lonely, the wretched and poor,

That voice of the Christ-Child shall fall;
And to every blind wanderer opens the door
Of a hope which he dared not to dream of before,

With a sunshine of welcome for all.

Where the feet of the holiest have trod,
This, this is the marvel to mortals revealed,
When the silvery trumpets of Christmas have pealed

That mankind are the children of God.

MIDSUMMER IN THE NEW YORK TENEMENTS—ENROLLING LITTLE CANDIDATES FOR MONT-LAWN

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The usual five new questions are omitted this week, in order that other letters to "The Mail Bag," many of them long delayed, may receive attention. Hereafter, once a month, the entire page will be devoted to this class of letters.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

J. T. H., Aulander, N. C. What is the cost of the ground and building of the new Congressional Library at Washington?

Ten acres were purchased for the buildings and grounds at a cost of $4,000,000. The finished work, buildings included, has cost thus far about $7,000,000.

King's Daughter, Richmond, Va. 1. How shall I direct a package of clothes so that it will reach your Fresh-Air children? 2. What articles of clothing are most needed? 3. How should money be sent?

1. All clothing should be sent by express to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y. 2. Any and everything that children from four to twelve years-old can wear. Many a child comes to our Home without a whole suit of clothing to its name, although arrayed in the very best its mother could provide. All are needy, and very few have any clothes to speak of; and blouses, trousers, jackets, dresses, slips, underwear, night-drawers, shoes, stockings and hats are all very acceptable. Things that more fortunate children have outgrown are welcome, as well as new articles that kindly hands may fashion for our children. Could the friends who send in clothing see the joy and pride of little ones when their rags are replaced with clean, good garments, they would be amply repaid for their labor.

J. A. M., Summit Mills, Pa. I have $2,000 cash to be expended for missionary work. How should it be applied so that it may be productive of the greatest good? I may add that I know of a young woman, educated and consecrated, who is ready and willing to go to the foreign mission field.

Your letter seems, to a large extent, to answer itself. Can you do better than to arrange for the support of your young missionary friend in the work to which she seems to be called? Confer with your own church missionary board, and if it is satisfied with her fitness, there would be very little difficulty in arranging the rest. China, India, South America, South Africa, Persia, the Philippines and many other lands need missionary workers. By all means let her go out under the auspices of a good Board. The money could be applied direct, toward her support, for several years.

N. W. M., Dallas, Tex. Was Peter a martyr, and if so, what was the mode of his execution?

Accounts concerning the manner of his martyrdom are conflicting, although all agree that he died for the faith. Eusebius (quoting Dionysius, bishop of Corinth), says Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom together in Rome, Peter being crucified. Tertullian also mentions this joint martyrdom. The tradition that Peter was crucified head downward is probably fabulous, and may have arisen from a misunderstanding of Origen's reference to the subject. The later interpretation is that he was impaled to the cross by the head.

D. G. J. Is it a sin in God's sight to grow hops for the brewer or distiller, knowing what he will do with them?

If, knowing that he will convert the fruit of the soil into poison to destroy the body and soul of man, you sell that fruit to him, you share the responsibility with him for his act, and you cannot escape the conclusion that your own act is a sinful one.

Inquirer. Does dancing conflict with Christianity, and if so, in what degree, and why?

There is no harm in dancing itself, any more than there is in handling a pack of cards, but there are immense possibilities of harm in the associations in both cases. Dancing, we believe, was originally a solemn ceremonial movement and is so still in some countries, as witness the Hindu fakirs and the Moslem dervishes. Cards were originally devised to amuse a wearied and weak-minded monarch. Now, the popular dance, with its promiscuous acquaintanceships, late hours, and other objectionable accompaniments, which every one understands, is a social dissipation that has been fraught with peril to multitudes, who have dated their moral downfall from the day they first entered a ball-room. A waltz may be innocent and graceful, yet if it be the means chosen to bring vice and virtue together promiscuously—as is too frequently the case—it should be avoided. So in cards, the association and example too often lead to gambling and end in ruin. Better avoid both, and stick to pleasures that have no sting in them and which delight without degrading.

B. U. H., Grand Ridge, Ill. Was Columbus or Copernicus the first to advocate the theory that the earth was spherical in form?

Columbus believed the world to be a sphere in 1474, or earlier. Copernicus, who later advanced this theory, was born on Feb. 19, 1473. Astronomers living before either of these, had stated the earth to be round.

M. C. F., New York City. Would a pastor or a church do right to accept from an individual or business firm a gift of hymn-books, upon the fly-leaves at both ends of which are various advertisements of an indiscriminate character, though perhaps not really objectionable?

If the advertisements are not of an objectionable sort, we know of no reason why the hymn-books should not be received. Of course, such a gift would be much more graceful and pleasing without such an advertising accompaniment; but a needy church would hardly hesitate. The motive of the giver, too,

W. W. W., Chestnut Hill, Md. For what purpose did Noah remove the covering of the ark (Gen. 8: 13)?

The verse itself leads to the inference that he did so that he might look around. "He looked and beheld the face of the ground was dry." Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that "the ark rested on the top of a certain mountain in Armenia, which, when Noah understood, he opened it" (the Ark), etc. Commentators agree that he probably removed only as much of the covering as would afford him a prospect of the earth, now rising from the subsiding waters.

Minnie S., Sacramento, Calif. 1. Will you kindly tell me the origin of the forget-me-not? I have heard it said that after the battle of Waterloo, when the field was stained with blood, these little flowers sprang up, covering the ground with blue. 2. What is the origin of the dahlia? We have heard it was found under the arm of a mummy.

1. This story, like many others told about this little flower, is one of fancy. Before the battle of Waterloo was fought, forget-me-nots bloomed and poets wove pretty verses about it. It belongs, botanically, to the myosotis family, and from time immemorial has been latter was sailing after Cleopatra to Egypt, foretold the deaths of both Ptolemy and Antony. Swallows followed Cyrus from Scythia and ravens followed Alexander from India to Babylon, both, so the sages declared, presaging death. Maurya and Gay both wrote of the "fateful raven" on the day he was killed; Bishop Hall mentions the superstition of the bitter flying crane meaning death; Homer sang of the crane as boding sorrow, and even the eagle has been included as a bird of "evil omen." All are now regarded as foolish and outworn superstitions.

Mrs. C. H. R., Zanesville, O. Will you please in your paper a little sketch of "Neal Dow's" life, and answer why the W. C. T. U. celebrate his birthday?

Neal Dow was a noted American temperance reformer. He was born in Portland, Me., March 20, 1804; was elected Mayor of Portland in 1851 and re-elected in 1854. Mr. Dow became a champion of prohibition, and as through his efforts that the Maine liquor law was passed in 1851. He served in the Civil War; in 1862 being commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers. Afterwards he dedicated himself to the temperance cause in the United States, Canada and Great Britain, and was prohibition candidate for President of the United States. He died Oct. 2, 1897, in Portland. This history shows why the W. C. T. U. celebrate his birthday.

Reader. Is it wrong to perform mock marriages? A returned missionary, in a lecture given in a church, performed a marriage just to illustrate the ceremony as performed in China, using the entire form, the parties being dressed as they are on such occasions in China. Was it wrong to perform the ceremony? In what States would a marriage under these circumstances be binding?

We do not think the illustration you cite could rightly be called a mock marriage. As we understand it, a mock marriage is a mimicry of the ordinance, done in sport or derision for the amusement of onlookers. That is offensive and should be condemned. On the other hand, a rehearsal in which the principals and other parties are drilled, so that each may perform his or her part smoothly when the real event takes place, is not, properly speaking, a mock marriage. THE LATE D. L. MOODY

A GATHERING OF THE STUDENTS AT ROUND TOP

MIDSUMMER DAYS AT NORTHFIELD

THESE are busy days at Northfield. Though the bright presence and the unwearied energy which made a stay at Northfield an inspiration for a lifetime are there no longer, the work they initiated goes on. With loving reverence for his father's memory, and a humble desire to keep the movement which his father initiated and directed, on its old lines and with the same enthusiasm, Mr. Will R. Moody issued this year the invitation which is so welcome to many hearts.

On June 28, the first conference of the season opened with a large attendance. This was the Student's Conference, which is specially designed for the help of young men in our colleges—men who need such help as can be obtained at Northfield. No one has any conception, except those who have passed through the experience, how benumbing to the spiritual life is the work of the student in college. Even in our theological institutions, the students are liable to bring about a stagnation of the life of God in the soul. It is as if a medical student were more than other men liable to become morbid and fancy himself the prey of disease; the theological student is liable to be oppressed with gloom, and to come to regard religion as a matter of the head rather than the heart. There is no remedy good for this condition as that of getting close with God, away from classes and books, seeking a fresh baptism of the Spirit. "Come here and rest awhile," Christ said to his disciples when they had told him that they had been laboring and teaching. They had been going forth and teaching others, and Christ saw that they needed to receive and save their own souls. It was a wise and kindly thing on the part of the late Mr. D. L. Moody, to give a similar invitation to the young men who will be the leaders of the church in the future, and many acknowledged with devout thankfulness the benefit they derived from it. We are glad that Mr. Will Moody has followed his father's example in this matter, and that so large a response was made. The students could not have found better helpers anywhere than the men who were waiting to receive them. They are men who know how to sympathize with young men, and are acquainted with the faculties the student is most likely to meet. Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Mr. Robert E. Speer, and Hon. Seth Low, of New York, Dr. Alexander McKenzie, of

Cambridge, Mass., and others were among the leaders. The Young Women's Conference, which followed that of the Students', was a genuine surprise. Never before had so large a number of bright, enthusiastic girls been seen at Northfield. Over forty officers of Young Women's Christian Associations were present, and there were parties of representatives of colleges and other organizations from many sections of the United States and Canada. This year, too, Honolulu was represented in the Young Women's Conference. Ladies from Nebraska, Washington and Minnesota had an opportunity of making acquaintance with sisters from Virginia and Ohio and Florida. Daily meetings were held in the

Toward the close of his life, he more and more sought to reach the great masses of the people through the men to whom they are accustomed to listen. In influencing one such man, he knew that he was influencing hundreds or thousands. This is the nineteenth of these Conferences, and it promises to be one of the most useful. Well known workers from North, South, East and West are there in increased numbers, all intent on getting new vigor and inspiration for their work. In addition to the regular morning and evening meetings in the Auditorium, three special Institutes have been inaugurated. The Young People's Institute, conducted by Mr. John Willis Baer, of the Christian Endeavor

Society; the Musical Institute, conducted by Prof. D. B. Towner, and the Institute on Christian Doctrine, conducted by Rev. R. A. Torrey; all hold daily meetings. Among the leaders of the meetings in the Auditorium are Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. Samuel Chadwick, of Leeds, England, Dr. J. Howard Taylor, son of the founder of the China Inland Mission, and his wife, formerly Miss Geraldine Guinness, Dr. Teunis S. Hamlin, of Washington, D. C., Dr. H. C. Mabie, of Boston, Mass., Dr. A. C. Dixon, Dr. A. T. Pierson, Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, and Rev. G. C. Needham.

To every one whose deep longing is put into the prayer "Thy Kingdom come," this Conference must be an important assembly. It comprises men from all parts of the country, who are doing frontier work. They represent the aggressive enterprises of the Church. The pastors have much of this work to do, but with these men it is the one business of their lives. At Northfield they compare notes, discuss suggestions, and arrange their plans for the campaign. Like the great Auditorium and on Round Top, besides the usual Bible Classes, Association and Missionary Conferences. At the closing meeting on Sunday evening, July 21, there were enthusiastic testimonies to the inspiration and stimulus which the meetings had imparted. It was a season that will live long in the memory of many an earnest Christian girl, bearing fruit in useful consecrated lives.

But the great assembly of the year is that now in session. This is the General Conference of Christian Workers which commenced August 1. Mr. Moody used to look forward to this Conference as the most hopeful and important of all the Northfield meetings.

Apostle, they have to become all things to all men, that they may gain some. They must keep pace with the times, and so present the Gospel to the hostile, and the indifferent, and the degraded, that it may appear to them, as it really is, the power of God unto salvation, and not the antiquated, obsolete doctrine that too many of them, are apt to think it. It is a difficult task, requiring tact, and patience, and penetration. At Northfield they meet other men engaged in the same warfare, and "as iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." There is no copyright in spiritual work, so that the methods which have been employed successfully in one field can be put in operation in another, and the man who has found a way of solving a difficulty in his sphere of labor, can impart his secret to his brother who is wrestling with a similar difficulty elsewhere. More important still in this enterprise, in which success does not come "by might or by power, but by my Spirit," saith the Lord, they unite in imploring from their Divine Master such an unction from on high as will make them mighty in their warfare, valiant in doing and suffering for Christ. In such a prayer every Christian can heartily join, and so the longing may be satisfied that is more and more filling the hearts of God's people that a great and widespread revival may bless their land.

One of the most interesting services in this year's Conference was the dedication of a new cottage. It is called the Connecticut Cottage, and is intended for the use of self-supporting young women who may wish to spend their vacations at Northfield. It is possible, at present, to secure the use of a tent ready furnished, or accommodation with others in a tent, at an extraordinarily low rate, and there are boarding-houses at prices which seem ridiculously low to the city dweller; but even these charges are prohibitive to many employees in stores or offices, whose entire savings for a year barely suffice for traveling expenses. The late Mr. Moody, with characteristic thoughtfulness, suggested to a well-known friend of young women, shortly before his death, the erection of a cottage which should be devoted exclusively to the occupation of self-supporting young women, and he promised to make a free gift of a site if funds could be obtained for building. Mr. Will R. Moody knew of his father's offer and renewed it on his own account. Miss Eastman, of New Britain, Conn., undertook the collection of funds, and soon raised the necessary amount, and at this year's Conference the cottage was ready for dedication. The exercises were of a simple character and were held under the presidency of Rev. C. Scofield, pastor of the Congregational Church. Mr. Will R. Moody and his brother made congratulatory addresses, and Miss Marshall, of Boston, Mass., who will have charge of the

It is impossible to be at Northfield without a sorrow. The cheery, genial personality which was wont to spring and centre is gone, and it is too soon to shake off the feeling of bereavement. But it is wonderful to see how much is done to fill the vacancy. Moody brothers, who feel the loss most keenly, suffer their sorrow to depress them or to let it on others. None know better than they how impossible it is ever to fill the place of their beloved father, but he is doing well and nobly in reverently carrying on the work he loved so well. There is no moving so good or so sweet as that. It shows true love and reverence if we can imagine the spirit of the departed hovering over the scenes in which he delighted, we may be sure that he is glad to see his sons so earnestly and reverently trying to keep alive the movement he started and maintained. It is gratifying to see how well they are succeeding. Both in numbers and enthusiasm the assemblies pass even those of Mr. Moody's lifetime. There is reason for thankfulness, too, that Mr. Morgan's self cottage, made a statement of the arrangements for its management, and the objects the building is designed to accomplish. Mr. Moody expressed his gratification at the fulfilment of the project in which his father had taken so deep an interest, and said he hoped that many such cottages might be built in the near future. The young men already have one called Lowell Lodge, which is fully occupied every year. The fact that over 500 young women attended the Conference this year shows how useful such a building is likely to be.

is continued. He is a host in himself, and where his voice is heard there is not likely to be any depression or lack of spiritual tone. Mr. Moody loved him and often acknowledged that under his preaching, he himself, received new stimulus and inspiration. His lessons on the cardinal doctrines of Christianity—Atonement, The New Birth and Sanctification, that whatever vagaries other preachers may adopt, strong, eloquent voice is true to the faith once delivered to the saints.

A CHURCH ALL OUT-DOORS

By EDWIN S. GRAY

The Interesting Record of a New Experiment in Gospel Work in the Pittsburg Public Parks

THE problem of reaching the masses, or what is known as the "non-churchgoers," is a problem which the Second Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pa. (Rev. S. Edward Young, pastor), has been trying hard to solve. The question has been closely studied by the pastor and officers of the church during the last three or four years, and, judging from practical results, the methods and plans used demonstrate that the "old, old story," preached and sung, loses none of its power when presented to the masses under environments or with surroundings selected by themselves.

The local situation of the Second Church compelled attention to this question, being situated in the "downtown" or very heart of the business district. Business and manufacturing interests have forced residents to the suburbs, so that no less than thirty-five churches of many denominations, within the late years, have abandoned the "downtown" district for lack of attendance. Notwithstanding these discouraging conditions, the audiences and results at all services at the Second Church are exceedingly gratifying, and it is not an unusual thing for hundreds to be turned away at some of the evening services.

The experiences and results obtained in bringing about this condition led the pastor and officers to pay special attention to the great problem of reaching the enormous crowds of people frequenting the City and Traction Parks on the Sabbath days, and of counteracting the tendency to Sabbath desecration by so-called "sacred concert" and vaudeville entertainments.

Pittsburg's beautiful Schenley Park is the popular breathing-place of that city. It is an ideal place for large public gatherings, with an elevated platform, or stage, equipped with a perfect sounding-board. It is lighted by 150 electric lights. Seats for 20,000 people can be placed, and as many more can hear fairly well from the groves and hillsides surrounding.

For three seasons Rev. Mr. Young has held a series of preaching services in this music pavilion, with marked success, the estimated average attendance being from eight thousand to ten thousand, the largest attendance being between eighteen thousand and twenty thousand, while the smallest was a few hundreds, who, in spite of a heavy rain, sat on the backs of the seats and listened as long as the services lasted.

The marked cosmopolitan nature of these audiences is shown in the large number of foreigners present. At every service can be seen Chinese, Slavs, Greeks, Hungarians, Italians, Armenians, many with their entire families. The roadway surrounding the pavilion is always lined with well-filled carriages belonging to well-to-do Americans. The open-air preaching is preceded by a song service, led by a large chorus choir of eighty voices of the Second Church, under the direction of B. Franklin Butts, with Sam M. Brown as organist. The choir is accompanied by either a full orchestra or full brass band. The hymns and songs are printed on single slips and distributed to all within reach. Solo singing by the available talent is made a feature of the work. The usual order of church worship is observed, except, perhaps, the recitation by the people of some portion of the verse or verses of Scripture, which is "lined out" by the pastor, and they learn it. Before dismissing the audience, Mr. Young makes an appeal for those wishing to be Christians or to be prayed for, to hold up their hands. This is responded to by large numbers, sometimes literally by hundreds.

A new feature this summer is a large tent, seating 600 to 800, at the rear of the seats, in which an "after meeting" is held. The tent is generally filled, while large numbers stand around outside, and are distributed for the purpose of ascertaining church preferences, and frequently it is half past ten o'clock before pastor and workers start for home.

Mr. Edward M. Bigelow, Director of Public Safety, and Mr. W. M. Falkner, Superintendent of Schenley Park, have consented in every way possible to the success of the meetings.

Their results have been most gratifying. Young to plan the holding of Sabbath preaching services in each of the City Parks and the Traction Park situated in the suburbs. The managers of the traction companies agreed to close all secular entertainments for the day, and to permit Mr. Young to arrange a series of preaching services in the action Parks. Seven were also arranged for Schenley and Highland Parks. Seven pastors, including Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Dutch Reformed and United Presbyterian denominations, are enlisted, and it is estimated that 40,000 people heard the Gospel preached. By far, the largest proportion were non-churchgoers. The Christian Endeavor Society of the Second Church, conducted a prayer service in the tent, previous to the other services. The tent is named "Endeavor."

Under the three years' and half pastorate of Rev. S. Edward Young, the Second Presbyterian Church has had a remarkable record. Almost nine hundred persons united with the Church, over eight hundred being adults who united on confession of faith. The Church will celebrate its hundredth anniversary in 1902, and elaborate plans are under way for the occasion.

A UNIQUE GOSPEL ENTERPRISE
AMID THE MOORMEN, MALAYS, TAMILS AND BURGHERS

By REV. ROBERT WARD, of Godhra India

RECENTLY the precarious state of my health compelled me to leave my work at Godhra, India, for a trip to the beautiful and famous island of "Lanka," or Ceylon. While speeding through one of the main streets in a jinriksha, I was surprised to see a two-storied building covered with announcements in several languages concerning Gospel work, so I turned back and entered the Meeting Hall, where another surprise was ready for me. The promoter and conductor of the institution I found to be my old friend, Mr. C. F. Rutnam, M. A., who is not unknown to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He introduced me to Mrs. Rutnam (formerly Miss Mary Irwin, M.D., of Oario), whom I found to be a gentle and accomplished lady—the energetic and bright over more of the women's work to Miss La Brooy, who is at present busily engaged in the medical branch of the mission.

That Dr. Rutnam loves the people among whom she works, and that they appreciate her, were manifest to me, as I sat and talked one evening in Hindustani (which they know slightly), to some of the young Moslem children. They showed none of that sullen behavior which Indian Mohammedan children so often assume in the presence of a Christian worker. Mr. and Mrs. Rutnam's little son, Alan, is always very welcome among the women and children.

In the upper portion of the building, which is much

Jesus is tangibly exemplified before these Moslem or Buddhist students. Bible texts and other inscriptions on the walls, remind one of the evangelistic work which is carried on in the same hall when the classes are silent. Through the windows in front we get an extensive view of the lake, over the surface of which small steam launches and curious catamaran-like craft are conveying parties of foreign or native pleasure-seekers. An occasional boat adorned with paper lanterns and streamers and other Buddhist paraphernalia, and accompanied by the beating of drums or tom-toms, brings back forcibly to one's mind the stern fact that the fair isle of Ceylon, which the tender heart and inspired pen of good old Bishop Heber have rendered famous throughout the world, is still mainly heathen.

With these earnest workers I had the pleasure of elpein all of Mr. Rutnam's varied labors. The ground floor of the Meeting Hall building is devoted mainly to the medical missionary work of Mrs. Rutnam, who tells some very interesting facts concerning her work among the Moslem women, who, as is well known, are hard to reach in most parts of Asia. I was privileged to accompany Dr. Rutnam on one of her visits, and was pleased to see what ready assistance she obtains to the homes, or zenanas, of the women. This, no doubt, is facilitated by the knowledge of the language and customs of the people, which she has patiently acquired. Unlike the Mohammedans of India, the Ceylon Moslems do not generally practice polygamy, and are not afraid of their women being educated, or learning English even. As soon as the necessity of Dr. Rutnam's medical work is relieved by the presence of another assistant, it is intended to hand too small for the work, Mr. Rutnam conducts his collegiate classes. What an interesting picture it is!—Moormen, Malays, Tamils, Burghers and others, all seated together, but shown by their distinctive styles of dress, and all learning those things best calculated to make them self-respecting citizens of the island in after life. As Mr. Rutnam goes from class to class, it is easy to see that, in spite of difference of creed, there is a reciprocal feeling of friendship between teacher and pupils. The entire teaching staff is Christian, and that is a guarantee that in many little ways the Gospel of spending a delightful week. In such esteem and confidence are Mr. and Mrs. Rutnam held by the people, that they are continually pressed by Mohammedan and other parents, to open a branch of the Meeting-Hall as a boarding-school, in which their sons will be trained. This may soon be accomplished. In one important respect this whole enterprise is exceptional, inasmuch as Mr. and Mrs. Rutnam do not depend upon the public for maintenance, but support themselves by the fees which they earn in their professional capacities, so that all the Sunday meetings, Sabbath School, Bible classes and other evangelistic work is a labor of love, spontaneously given by the leaders and staff of the Meeting Hall Institute.

I believe that this unique Christian enterprise has a wonderful and profitable future before it.

A GOSPEL OF SWEET SPICES

TEXT -- II. Chron. 9:9:

Of spices great abundance: neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave King Solomon.

WHAT is that building out yonder, glittering in the sun? Have you not heard? It is the House of the forest of Lebanon. King Solomon has just taken to it his bride, the princess of Egypt. You see the pillars of the portico, and a great tower, adorned with one thousand shields of gold, hung on the outside of the tower—five hundred of the shields of gold manufactured at Solomon's order, five hundred were captured by David, his father, in battle. See how they blaze in the noonday sun!

Solomon was not like some of the kings of the present day—crowned imbecility. All the splendors of his palace and retinue were eclipsed by his intellectual power. Why, he seemed to know everything. His navy visited all the world, and the sailors, of course, talked about the wealth of their king, and about the riddles and enigmas that he made and solved; and the news spread until Queen Balkis, away off south, heard of it, and sent messengers with a few riddles that she would like to have Solomon solve, and a few puzzles that she would like to have him find out.

Queen Balkis was so pleased with the acuteness of Solomon, that she said: "I'll just go and see him for myself." Yonder it comes—the cavalcade—horses and dromedaries, chariots and charioteers, jingling harness and clattering hoofs, and blazing shields, and flying ensigns, and clapping cymbals. The place is saturated with the perfume. She brings cinnamon, and saffron, and calamus, and frankincense, and all manner of sweet spices. As the retinue sweeps through the gate, the armed guard inhale the aroma. "Halt!" cry the charioteers, as the wheels grind the gravel in front of the pillared portico of the king. Queen Balkis alights in an atmosphere bewitched with perfume. As the dromedaries are driven up to the king's storehouses, and the bundles of camphor are unloaded, and the sacks of cinnamon, and the boxes of spices are opened, the purveyors of the palace discover what my text announces: "Of spices great abundance; neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

Religion an Inspiration

Well, my friends, you know that all theologians agree in making Solomon a type of Christ, and in making the Queen of Sheba a type of every truth-seeker; and I will take the responsibility of saying that all the spikenard, and cassia, and frankincense which the Queen of Sheba brought to King Solomon is mightily suggestive of the sweet spices of our holy religion. Christianity is not a collection of sharp technicalities, and angular facts, and chronological tables, and dry statistics. Our religion is compared to frankincense and to cassia, but never to nightshade. It is a bundle of myrrh. It is a dash of holy light. It is a sparkle of cool fountains. It is an opening of opaline gates. It is a collection of spices. Would God that we were as wise in taking spices to our Divine King as Queen Balkis was wise in taking the spices to the earthly Solomon.

The fact is that the duties and cares of this life, coming to us from time to time, are stupid often, and inane, and intolerable. Here are men who have been battering, climbing, pounding, hammering for twenty years, forty years, fifty years. One great, long drudgery has their life been. Their face anxious, their feelings benumbed, their days monotonous. What is necessary to brighten up that man's life, and to sweeten that acid disposition, and to put sparkle into the man's spirits? The spicery of our holy religion. Why, if between the losses of life there dashed the gleam of an eternal gain; if between the betrayals of life there came the gleam of the undying friendship of Christ; if in dull times in business we found ministering spirits flying to and fro in our office, and store, and shop, every-day life, instead of being a stupid monotone, would be a glorious inspiration, penduluming between calm satisfaction and high rapture.

How any woman keeps house without the religion of Christ to help her, is a mystery to me. To have to spend the greater part of one's life, as many women do, in planning for the meals, and stitching garments that will soon be rent again, and deploring breakages, and supervising tardy subordinates, and driving off dust that soon again will settle, and doing the same thing day in and day out, and year in and year out, until the hair silvers, and the back stoops, and the spectacles crawl to the eyes, and the grave breaks open under the thin sole of the shoe—oh, it is a long monotony? But when Christ comes to the drawing-room, and comes to the kitchen, and comes to the nursery, and comes to the dwelling, then how cheery become all womanly duties.

I must confess that a great deal of the religion of this day is utterly insipid. There is nothing piquant or elevating about it. Men and women go around humming psalms in a minor key, and cultivating melancholy, and their worship has in it more sighs than raptures. We do not doubt their piety. Oh, no. But they are sitting at a feast where the cook has forgotten to season the food. Everything is flat in their experience and in their conversation. Emancipated from sin, and death, and hell, and on their way to a magnificent heaven, they act as though they were trudging on toward an everlasting Botany Bay. Religion does not seem to agree with them. It seems to catch in the wind-pipe and become a tight strangulation instead of an exhilaration. Who wants a religion woven out of the shadows of the night? Why go growling on your way to celestial enthronement? Come out of that cave, and sit down in the warm light of the Sun of Righteousness. Away with your odes to melancholy and Hervey's Meditations among the Tombs.

Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Emmanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high.

I have to say, also, that we need to put more spice and enlivenment in our religious teaching; whether it be in the prayer-meeting, or in the Sunday School, or in the Church. We ministers need more fresh air and sunshine in our lungs, and our heart, and our head. Do you wonder that the world is so far from being converted when you find so little vivacity in the pulpit and in the pew? We want, like the Lord, to plant in our sermons and exhortations more lilies of the field. We want fewer rhetorical elaborations, and fewer sesquipedalian words. Let us be plain. Let us be earnest. Let us be common-sensical. When we talk to the people in a vernacular they can understand, they will be very glad to come and receive the truth we present. Would to God that Queen Balkis would drive her spice-laden dromedaries into all our sermons and prayer-meeting exhortations.

More than that, we want more life and spice in our Christian work. The poor do not want so much to be groaned over as sung to. With the bread, and medicines, and garments you give them, let there be an accompaniment of smiles and brisk encouragement. Do not stand and talk to them about the wretchedness of their abode, and the hunger of their looks, and the hardness of their lot. Ah! they know it better than you can tell them. Tell them that for the children of God there is immortal rescue. Wake them up out of their stolidity by an inspiring laugh, and while you send in help, like the Queen of Sheba also send in the spices. There are two ways of meeting the poor. One is to come into their house with a nose elevated in disgust, as much as to say: "I don't see how you live here in this neighborhood. It actually makes me sick. There is that bundle—take it, you poor miserable wretch, and make the most of it." Another way is to go into the abode of the poor in a manner which seems to say: "The blessed Lord sent me. He was poor himself. It is not more for the good I am going to try to do you than it is for the good that you can do me." Coming in that spirit, the gift will be as aromatic as the spikenard on the feet of Christ, and all the hovels on that alley will be fragrant with the spice.

Spice in Music

We need more spice and enlivenment in our church music. Churches sit discussing whether they shall have choirs, or precentors, or organs, or bass-voils, or cornets; I say, take that which will bring out the most inspiring music. If we had half as much zeal and spirit in our churches as we have in the songs of our Sunday Schools, it would not be long before the whole earth would quake with the coming God. Why, nine-tenths of the people in church do not sing; or they sing so feebly that the people at their elbows do not know they are singing. People mouth and mumble the praises of God; but there is not more than one out of a hundred who makes a joyful noise unto the Rock of our Salvation. Sometimes, when the congregation forgets itself, and is all absorbed in the goodness of God, or the glories of heaven, I get an intimation of what church music will be a hundred years from now, when the coming generation shall wake up to its duty.

Now I want to impress you with the fact that religion is sweetness, and perfume, and spikenard, and saffron, and cinnamon, and cassia, and frankincense, and all sweet spices together. "Oh," you say, "I have not looked at it as such. I thought it was a nuisance; it had for me a repulsion; I held my breath as though it were a malodor; I have been appalled at its advance; I have said, if I have any religion at all, I want to have just as little of it as is possible to get through with." Oh, what a mistake you have made, my brother. The religion of Christ is a present and everlasting redolence. It counteracts all trouble. Just put it on the pillow beside the pillow of sickness. It catches in the curtain and perfumes the stifling air. It sweetens the cup of bitter medicine, and throws a glow on the gloom of turned lattice. It is a balm for the aching side, a soft bandage for the temple stung with pain. It led Samuel Rutherford into a revelry of spiritual delight, while he was in physical agonies. It helped Richard Baxter until, in the midst of such a complication of diseases as perhaps no other man ever suffered, he wrote The Saint's Everlasting Rest. And it poured light upon John Bunyan's dungeon—the light of the shining gate of the shining city. And it is good for rheumatism, and for neuralgia, and for low spirits, and for consumption; it is the catholicon for all disorders. Yes, it will heal all your sorrows.

Relief for the Burdened

I see all around about me widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness; sadness, disappointment, perplexity. If I could ask all those in any audience who have felt no sorrow, and been buffeted by no disappointment, I could ask all such to rise, how many would? Not one. Dear Lord, is there no appeasement for this sorrow that I see about me? Yes, the thought of resurrection and reunion far beyond this scene of struggle and tears. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, neither any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water. God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." As the couches of your sick, and across the graves of the dead, I fling this shower of sweet spices. Queen Balkis, driving up to the pillared portico of the house of the Lord, carried no such pungency of perfume as exhales today from the Lord's garden. It is peace. It is sweetness. It is comfort. It is infinite satisfaction, this Gospel I commend to you.

Have you read of the Taj Mahal in India, in which respects the most majestic building on earth? Twenty thousand men were twenty years in building it. It cost about sixteen millions of dollars. The walls are of marble, inlaid with cornelian from Bagdad, and amethyst from Thibet, and jasper from the Punjab, and stones. A traveler said that it seemed to him like the shining of the enchanted castle of burnished silver. The walls are two hundred and forty-five feet high, and from the top of these springs a dome thirty feet high, that dome containing the most wonderful echo the world has ever known; so that ever and on travelers standing below with flutes, and drums and harps, are testing that echo, and the sounds from below strike up and then come down as it were.

The Voices of Angels

all around about the building. There is nestling around it a garden of tamarind, and banyan, and palm, and all the floral glories of the ransacked earth. But there is only a tomb of a dead empress, and it is tame compared with the grandeurs which God has builded for our living and immortal spirit.

Oh, home of the blessed! Foundations of Arches of victory! Cap-stones of praise! and a dome in which there are echoing and re-echoing the halcyons of the ages. And around about that mansion a garden—the garden of God—and all the springing waters are the bottled tears of the Church in the wilderness, and all the crimson of the flowers is the deep red that was caught up from the carnage of earthly misdeeds, and the fragrance is the prayer of all the saints, and the aroma puts into utter forgetfulness the carnage, and the spikenard, and the frankincense, and the renowned spices which Queen Balkis, of Abysinia, flung at the feet of King Solomon.

When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold,
Thy bulwarks, with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?

Through obduracy on our part and through the rejection of that Christ who makes heaven possible, I wonder if any of us will miss that spectacle? The Queen of the South will rise up in judgment against this generation and condemn it, because she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon and behold, a greater than Solomon is here!

May God grant that through your own practical experience you may find that religion's ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are paths of life—that it is perfume now and perfume forever. There was an abundance of spice; "neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

FAMINE'S * DEATH-ROLL * IN * SHENSI

Chairman Smith Cables that 700 are Dying Daily in the Capital --- Relief Promptly Sent by Our Committee --- Letters from the Field

THIS week Shensi, the most remote of the Chinese famine provinces, has been heard from. Till now, only an occasional meagre message, drifting through Shansi — the neighboring province and also famine-smitten — has reached Peking or Tientsin; but these brief communications were full of ominous meaning, and indicated a condition fully as distressing as that in Shansi itself. Our Missionary Relief Committee, realizing the need in Shensi, had already appropriated and forwarded by the hands of the Rev. M. B. Duncan, a member of the Committee, the sum of 10,000 taels (equal to about $7,000), for the purchase of food supplies. Soon the Committee's inquiries regarding Shensi revealed a frightful state of affairs. For many months past famine has raged there unchecked and starvation and fever have claimed thousands of victims. In the capital city of Sing-an-fu, the mortality had been appalling. At the time the news came there was no apparent abatement of the general distress, and the death-rate among all classes was as high as ever.

speaking of the missions of E. H. Edwards to Shansi and M. B. Duncan to Shensi, says:

"They have heavy loads on their shoulders, and will have no leisure for more than business statements as to the use which they are making of the money. . . . It is literally impossible to do anything useful in this line in the interior, except through missionaries. I have sent about Tls. 1,200 to my own field in Shantung, to assist the destitute of whom I telegraphed you, to whom it will be 'water to a fish in a dry rut.' The same is doubtless true of those whom Mr. Harmon (Shantung) will help. The labor involved in managing the wise and honest disbursement of the Fund in conditions like those in Shansi, are impossible to realize in New York."

From the full correspondence and reports of the meetings in Tientsin of the Missionary Relief Committee, now received, it appears that Earl Li Hung Chang intended originally to include Shensi in his appeal to American sympathy through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This fact was learned by the Committee through Governor Tseng, the Viceroy's secretary. As thy with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief work. Among those who have attended the meetings relative to the distribution of the Famine Fund, were Drs. Sheffield, Lowry, Richard, Headland, Atwood, Creary, Smith, Mapes, Duncan, Stelb, Allen and Edwards, representatives of the leading Christian denominations that are active in the Chinese mission field. From this distinguished list of Christian missionaries the Famine Relief Committee was chosen. That Committee undertook the duty of organizing and conducting the relief work, with full power and responsibility in the premises, the high character and wide experience of its members giving assurance of wise and faithful performance.

Since its organization, it has pushed the relief work with vigor. Letters from Shansi are now on the way, Chairman Smith's cablegram states, and these, when received, will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order that its readers and all who are interested in the life-saving work may know what the Committee has accomplished in that province.

A PETTY OFFICIAL AND HIS RETINUE

A BUSY THOROUGHFARE FOR NATIVE HUCKSTERS

From the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Chairman of our Famine Committee, we have received this cablegram, which reveals the state of affairs in a few words:

Tientsin, via Eastern Azores,
July 23.

Dr. Jopsch, New York.

Shensi letters mailed yesterday. Balance of relief sent to Hankow for Shensi. Seven hundred deaths daily Sing-an-fu.

Seven hundred deaths daily of famine and fever in a big city! Who can describe the suffering and the agony of these people, who for months have been fighting back hunger, and hoping against hope, for relief. Such a rate of mortality in an American city would rouse our whole nation to the active work of rescue; but these poor native heathen and Christian converts of Shensi, being in the centre of a vast section, full of it famine-swept, were apparently forgotten amid the general suffering, until the kind-hearted missionaries undertook to send what substantial aid the Fund afforded. In addition to the 10,000 taels already appropriated, the unexpended balance of the second remittance sent to the Committee from the Fund in New York has now been applied wholly to Shensi. Chairman Smith's cable message states that the relief for Shensi will be sent by way of Hankow. Stores of provisions can doubtless be procured there, though at very high prices, and conveyed by boats up the Han River to the head of navigation in Shensi. Sing-an-fu and other points to be relieved can then be reached by mule-carts, with little loss of time.

In a letter from Chairman Smith to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, dated at Tientsin, June 20, just received, the writer, the Committee, on its own request, was granted full power as to the apportionment of the Fund and the relief methods to be adopted, it decided, as already stated in previous issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to include Shensi, and portions of Chihli and Shantung as well. Messrs. Duncan and Richards strongly advocated the opening of relief work in Shensi. It was believed that valuable aid would be rendered by native Christians there and by friendly officials.

All the missionaries in Tientsin, and those at Peking and other places throughout China, are in warm sympathy

Our mail this week has been filled with letters overflowing with expressions of the kindest sympathy for the starving people of China. A lady (Mrs. S. H. L., New Haven, Conn.), writes: "What a great work you have undertaken—the relief of China! The sound of it is thrilling to me, but it is God's work you are doing as taught by his beloved Son, to 'render good for evil,' and surely he will sustain you and we must help you all we can. It is a patriotic work, too, for there are grave reasons why America should come up resolutely and generously to the help of China now, as upon our assistance at this time depends the future well-being of our missionaries, and the Christian cause itself."

"I pray that wisdom and fortitude may be ours now, that we as a nation may do all that our duty to God and humanity requires of us. God be praised for such grand, good men and women as the band of CHRISTIAN HERALD workers, who are so ardently devoting themselves to his service. What would this world be without such great-souled sons and daughters?"

All contributions should be addressed to the China Famine Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be acknowledged.

Photographs from China

Some of our illustrations of China in former issues were furnished through the courtesy of Messrs. Underwood & Underwood, of New York, the well-known publishers of fine stereoscopic photographs. This enterprising firm, early last year, sent Professor James Ricalton, one of their best photographers, to China, who, in spite of almost insurmountable obstacles, secured a very fine series of stereographs.

The Sunday School Teacher Under Fire

SECLAR journals have been making capital out of the exposition of the Sunday School lessons which has been published by the Pilgrim Press of Boston and Chicago. They compare the teaching there given, with the teaching on the same subjects given fifty years ago, and contend that the one contradicts the other, and the modern is of a materialistic character. This is a strange criticism, coming from that source, inasmuch as those journals have been in the habit of representing religious teachers as hide-bound and unprogressive. This mode of dealing with religious teachers is scarcely fair. If they continue teaching the Bible as it was taught by their fathers, they are denounced as men who never learn anything, and who remain wilfully ignorant of the discoveries of science; if they accept those discoveries, and account for the discrepancies between science and theology by frankly saying that the writers of the Bible were unscientific men, they are charged with irreverence and practical infidelity.

Disregarding all such criticism, which is of the caviling, unsympathetic type, the Sunday School teacher is nevertheless embarrassed in preparing to meet the bright boys and girls in his class, who know more about science than his grandfather knew in his old age. If he teaches these lessons as they used to be taught, he is quite sure that now, or in a very few years, his pupils will reject his teaching as hopelessly discredited. On the other hand, he could not hope, in the short time at his disposal, to make the child understand the grounds on which the Bible and science can be harmonized.

What, then, must he do? The Bible writers set him the example. They did not recognize it to be any part of their duty to teach science. Their aim was to reveal God to the world, to show men how God ruled the world, to declare that the world was made by him and that people owe him their homage and obedience, that to obey him is to be placed in the way of infinite development, and to disobey him is to oppose him and to perish. In teaching these truths, which are of no age or time, but eternal, the Bible writers used, illustratively, the science of the time, so far as it had been developed. They used the materials at their hand, and one could wish that at the time of writing the modern custom of using quotation marks had existed. They were not careful about dates and the length of periods, as we expect a modern historian to be. Their object was to lead men to fear God and live righteous lives, and they regarded all other objects as merely incidental. A mistake in those matters does not discredit their main teaching, any more than would a blunder in the date of some battle discredit a lecturer on anatomy, who incidentally referred to the battle as an illustration. It would discredit a historian, but would not lead us to doubt the anatomical teaching of the lecturer. So with the Bible. The eternal truths in its pages are impregnable, and those truths are what the Bible was designed to teach, and if the Sunday School teacher will content himself with teaching them, he plants his feet on a rock which will never be moved.

That the differences between the Biblical narrative and the conclusions of science have been exaggerated, is certain, and such differences as there are, appear to be mainly due, not so much to direct statements in the Bible, as to the meaning we have been accustomed, under the guidance of Milton and others, to read into them and which we are now learning to discard.

A great deal of stress has been placed by the critics of the secular press on the divergence in the date of the Deluge. To select that topic for attack argues a lack of strategic skill on their part. There is no ancient literature, with the possible exception of the Egyptian, without some myth of the Deluge, and in some instances the parallelism with the Biblical account is remarkable. The fact of the Deluge, as the Bible gives it, is thus corroborated more fully than might have been expected. The Bible writers do not give its date. It is true that in the margin a date is given, but that is the work of Archbishop Ussher, who lived in the seventeenth century, and was probably a better theologian than chronologist. The teacher is not bound to defend such a system of chronology as he constructed. The validity of the Bible narrative does not rest on Ussher's dates, and would remain firm if all his dates were swept away.

The great facts of man's sin, his alienation from God, his way to regeneration, and the assured welcome he receives when he comes penitent to a sin-pardoning God are the Bible writers' topics, and the Sunday School teacher will find he has enough to do if he confines himself to them and lets science and chronology alone.

I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. 1. Cor. 2:2.

Preliminary Exercises

BY common consent, the exercises in the churches going before the sermon are called "preliminaries." The dictionary says that a "preliminary" is that which precedes the main business. We do not think the sermon ought to be considered the main business. When a pastor at the beginning of the first prayer says "O God!" he has entered upon the most important duty of the service. We would not deprecate the sermon, but we plead for more attention to the "preliminaries." If a minister cannot get the attention of the people for prayer or Bible-reading, it is his own fault. Much of the interest of a service depends upon how it is launched.

The "preliminaries" are, for the most part, the time in which people in church examine their neighbor's clothes. Milliners and tailors get the advantage of the first three-quarters of an hour. The "preliminaries" are the time to scrutinize the fresco, and look round to see who is there, and get yourself generally fixed.

This idea is fostered by some elocutionary professors who would have the minister take the earlier exercises of the occasion to get his voice in tune. You must not speak out at first. It is to be a private interview between you and heaven. The people will listen to the low grumble, and think it must be very good if they could only hear it. As for ourselves, we refuse to put down our head in public prayer until we find out whether or not we are going to be able to hear. Though you preach like an angel you will not say anything more important than the letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, or that Psalm of David which you have just now read to the backs of the heads of the congregation. Laymen and ministers, speak out! The opening exercises were not instituted to clear your voice, but to save souls. If need be, squeeze a lemon and eat a dozen troches for the sake of your voice before you go to church; but once there, make your first sentence resonant and mighty for God. An hour and a half is a short time anyhow to get five hundred or five thousand people ready for heaven. It is thought classic and elegant to have a delicate utterance, and that loud tones are vulgar. But we never heard of people being converted by anything they could not hear. It is said that on the Mount of Olives Christ "opened his mouth and taught them," by which we conclude he spake out distinctly. God has given most Christians plenty of lungs, but they are too lazy to use them. There are in the churches old people hard of hearing who, if the exercises be not clear and emphatic, get no advantage save that of looking at the blessed minister.

So they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand. Neh. 8:8.

Mysteries of Providence

WHY? The question drones itself in and out of the brain, beats against the background of conscious thought, baffles our utmost penetration. Why are the gifted, the beautiful, the loving and beloved taken away, and the imbecile, the morose, the ill-favored, the unhappy left? On one side, the personage to whom life has been kind, and whose every day is a benefaction to the world; on the other, the weary, unsuccessful and discouraged drudge, whom the world will never miss; yet the latter is spared and lingers to old age, and the former perishes in the meridian of his powers. Truly, we say, man walketh in a vain show. Why? The puzzle of it disturbs us and distresses us, sometimes even more than the events themselves which awaken the interrogation.

There is one answer always ready and always sufficient to the Christian. God knows. That we are in the dark proves nothing as against the unspeakable comfort that he is in the light. As a weaver sitting at the loom sees the seamy side, rough and tangled, but is aware of the smooth side unfolding into perfect gleam as the potter moulding the clay kneads it as he works, and the refiner handling the fine gold submits it to the fiercest flame, that it may be purified, so our Lord does with his own. His the hand at the loom, his the shaping of the lump, his the separating of the dross from the pure metal. To God there are no mysteries; all is clear. To us there must ever be deep mysteries, strange experiences to which we have no clue; hours of groping, hours of pain, hours of prayer that can only throw the burden down at Jesus' feet and leave it there.

Why, we ask ourselves vainly, is the green earth allowed for us this summer, because of the friend who last year was here, but who, so soon after was no more? God had taken her? She seemed essential to make a husband, child, friends, work, but God stooped down and broke the slender chain, and set her free from these duties, and called her home. Why did the dark close over the brilliant youth, lad of so much promise, child of so much hope; why did he go forth from home and mother with a song on his lips to be drowned before night-fall? Why does the curse of insanity fall on this or the other splendid life? Why, to another just as the light grows dim, and silence shrouds the earth deluged in sweet sounds, and was thrilled by music.

Let this ever be our comfort:

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never-failing skill,
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will.

Resting as on a pillow on the dear love of God, trusting without a tremor to his tenderness, caring every care upon him, we cannot despair; we make our heart and go on.

If we believe in the future life, and in the work of our Lord concerning it, we may receive great consolation from the thought that Jesus has work for him to do on the other side the river. In some other part of his universe, those who leave us may be carrying out God's plan for the interrupted life, a life that may be going on there without even an interval of unconsciousness, a life of ministry, of study, and of love. The too, we may not be amiss in our feeling that Jesus cares so much for some of his dear disciples that he looks for their presence and sends for them soon, not waiting until they are old and weary, but taking them early to himself.

What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter. John 13:7.

A Veteran at Rest

A LONG life of useful labor closed on July 23 when Mr. E. W. Hawley, the tireless Sunday School worker, received the summons from labor to reward. Many of our readers knew him, through his services as Superintendent of the field work of the New York State Sunday School Association, and will miss his kindly, genial words and his wise counsel. He was intimately associated with the late Mr. D. L. Moody in his younger days, and a warm friendship was maintained between the two workers until death separated them. We are indebted to Rev. Joseph N. Hallock, editor of Christian Work, with which journal Mr. Hawley has long been connected, for a tribute to his memory, which appears on another page of this issue.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Rev. 13:14.

A LURID LIGHT is cast upon the famine situation in Shensi, China, by the cable message from Chairman Smith of our Relief Committee, published on another page of this issue. "Seven hundred deaths daily in Sing-an-fu," gives a grim hint of the tragedy of starvation and despair that is being enacted there. Our Committee has sent a double portion of the Relief fund to Shensi. Help is now on the way. It should be supplemented by still more liberal aid. This is a political and providential opportunity for the Christian world to "heap coals of fire" upon the heads of those who, at least, stood by consenting while our missionaries were martyred. There are, besides, many native Christians to be relieved. Send in your mite to the Famine Fund, and help the missionaries in their rescue work.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Brooklyn Bridge Disabled

THE thousands of persons who cross Brooklyn Bridge every morning from their homes in Brooklyn to their offices in New York, and in returning in the evening, were astonished to find on July 24, that all traffic over the bridge was suspended. They were permitted to walk over but no cars were allowed to cross. The inconvenience was very difficult to bear in the intense heat, as there was a great deal of grumbling on the part of the vast throng which trudged the mile and a quarter over the structure. There was, too, some consternation on the cause of the suspension of the car service was disclosed. It was learned that twelve of the steel rods by which, in the middle of the span, the roadway is attached to the cables had broken, and the roadway had consequently dropped on the north side about ten inches. The fact that such a break could occur caused some consternation. It appeared to indicate that the great structure was breaking down. The engineers say, however, that its strength is not impaired, and now that the rods have been put in, in place of the broken ones, it is as strong as ever. The breakage, nevertheless, is ominous. It suggests the suspicion that electrolysis has been as a result of the tremendous currents of electricity carried on the third rail and on the trolley wires for the use of the cars. The engineers attribute the breaking of the rods to vibration, and some even aver that there has been negligence in the painting of the bridge, but there is an increasing belief that electrolysis, which takes the strength and elasticity from steel, is the real cause of the trouble, and that it may have done more mischief than is yet known. It is very certain that an investigation will have to be made, for every day thousands of persons trust their lives to that bridge, and its safety must not be left in doubt. The public will insist on this, for men are naturally concerned about their bodies being exposed to peril. They are less solicitous about the safety of their souls, which may be secured beyond doubt by following the directions of God's word:

The highway of the upright is to depart from evil: he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul (Prov. 16: 17).

Veck of a House

A remarkable accident is reported from Harrisburg, Pa. A storekeeper of that city noticed the odor of escaping gas in his house, but was unable to locate the leak. His wife, and all his children but one, were away from home on vacation, so he did not have occasion to occupy several rooms in the house. He was exceedingly busy about his work, and thought the leak of gas was not important, and he promised himself that he would make a thorough search for it when he had time. Smatters went on for a week, and the nuisance grew worse. One morning, recently, the owner rose early, and went to his barn to feed his horse. His son rose and went into the basement, which had not been opened in several days. The shutters were closed, so the boy struck a light. Instantly there was a terrific explosion, which wrecked the whole house, and gave the houses on each side a severe shaking. The boy was carried to the hospital, where he lies in a critical condition. The storekeeper perceives now that the leakage of gas was more important than he thought it, for it has destroyed his property and imperilled the life of his son. Even this disaster is not so appalling as the moral wrecks in which character is sacrificed. They, too, might in many cases be prevented if at the beginning the little sins which poison the life were detected and expelled.

Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life (Prov. 4: 23).

Is Life for His Property

The workmen who are excavating the buried city of Pompeii, recently made a significant discovery. In uncovering the courtyard of a house which has been hidden under the ashes and lava for eighteen centuries, they found a well-preserved skeleton. Still tightly clutched in his hand was a bundle fastened by a hemp cord. Even in death the hand had not relaxed its hold. On opening the bundle it was found to contain a beautiful silver saucepan with a richly ornamented handle, several spoons, and a silver cup exquisitely chased and engraved. In his other hand were two keys. It is not difficult to infer the circumstances of his death. When the eruption began, this man had snatched up the keys of his plate closet, and made a bundle of these choice articles. He was hurrying away with them when he was caught by the ashen deluge. The delay of collecting and securing the plate was fatal. Many souls have been lost in the same way. The duty of insuring spiritual safety has been postponed until a fortune has been obtained, or some business success achieved, or some other worldly advantage secured, and the last opportunity of salvation is lost:

Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee (Acts 24: 25).

Saved by a Search-light

A man was rescued from drowning a few days ago in the Hudson River, through the thoughtfulness of the owner of a yacht at anchor near Newburgh, N. Y. A tug had taken a barge full of excursionists up the river, and had managed to escape the vigilance of his mother and enter the engine-room of a large manufactory in which the engineer is employed. The spectacle of the machine apparently alive fascinated the child, and he stood looking at it for some minutes in amazement. Then, as no one was there to prevent him, he crawled under the guard-rail that extends along one side of the engine-box. With the enormous fly-wheel swiftly revolving in front of him, and in the highest glee over the sight, the youngster ensconced himself snugly between the fly-wheel of the engine and the wall supporting the big shaft of the wheel. There was only a space of eighteen inches between the wheel and the wall. Then the lad settled down to enjoy the sport and rubbed his hands over the rim of the wheel. When the engineer a few minutes later saw the boy, he crawled to the spot, and reaching down drew the child away from the peril. The child whose enjoyment was thus interrupted was probably not very grateful to the engineer for his interference. When he gets older he will realize how great was the peril he was saved from. When the Christian has the light of eternity on his life on earth, he will doubtless see that some of the pains and losses that seemed mysterious to him when he endured them, were, like the engineer's act, a rescue from peril:

No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterwards it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby (Heb. 12: 11).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan preached on July 21 and 28 to enormous congregations at the Lafayette Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn.

The Jijo Shimpō, the leading journal of Tokio, Japan, is furnishing outings for poor children, on the plan adopted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The bi-centenary of the birth of John Wesley will occur on June 17, 1903, and Methodists suggest that it would be fitting if Epworth, where the popular preacher was born, should signalize the anniversary by a series of services.

The Countess Roberts appeals for $100,000 for the Jubilee Fund of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, of which she is president. The money will be spent on the extension of village work and the erection of another hospital and several new dispensaries.

The benefits of British rule in Egypt were tersely expressed by the Premier, Nubar Pasha, who said: "Egypt's chief needs were two—justice and water—and England is providing the one by her administration, and the other, by her great dams on the Nile."

The Brotherhood of the Kingdom held its annual conference at Marlborough-on-the-Hudson, July 29-August 2. Among the speakers were Rev. W. D. Bliss, Rev. Lindsay B. Longacre and Edwin Markham. Rev. Leighton Williams was elected Corresponding Secretary.

It was stated at the recent Christian Endeavor Convention that during the past year 100,000 young people were received into church membership from the societies. The amount raised for missions by the Christian Endeavor Societies last year is known to have been $200,215, besides large sums of which no report was made to the United Society.

A church, in London, still possesses an income originally given to it for buying faggots for burning heretics.

Mr. and Mrs. Oatts have returned from their tour around the world in the interests of Y. M. C. A. In nineteen months they traveled 46,000 miles, and Mr. Oatts addressed 866 meetings and conducted thirty-six missions.

Mr. and Mrs. T. MacKnight, who are conducting a missionary work at Tahra, Las Palmas, Canary Islands, write that their work now has a foothold in two islands. They are constantly visiting in towns and villages, and have sold between 700 and 800 Bibles, Testaments and Gospels. A Bible depot will shortly be opened.

Bishop Warne, of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, says that, compared with India, the climate of the Philippines is bracing and fit to make them a sanitarium. While in the Philippines he has succeeded in starting a total abstinence society among the American soldiers, of which Major E. W. Halford, formerly private secretary of President Harrison, is president.

An Evangelistic service was held on July 28 in the Haymarket, a notorious dance hall in New York. Application was made to Commissioner Devery of the Police for permission, and he cordially granted it, and undertook to get "Ed" Corey, the proprietor of the Hall, to permit the meeting to take place. Mr. Corey not only gave the use of the Hall free of charge, but supplied the lights without charge. It is hoped that some of the habits of the Hall will be induced to attend these services, which are to be held on other Sunday evenings.

In view of the attacks on Christian missionaries in China, the disinterested testimony of Sir Robert Hart, who probably knows more about China than any other living foreigner, deserves notice. Sir Robert Hart says that in view of the terrible sufferings caused by the Chinese, the sufferers are entitled to receive full indemnification. He says he does not believe that the missionaries have brought any one to punishment who did not richly deserve it, and that many Boxer leaders are now at large whose punishment would have bettered the outlook for the future.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE, RECENTLY DISABLED

The cross shows the place where the suspending rods broke where they had a day of pleasure. The sun had set before they started on the return trip, and when the barge reached Newburgh it was quite dark. In some unexplained way, probably in some rough horse-play, a man slipped overboard. It was impossible for the tug to turn, but, happily there were some men in a rowboat near by, and when they heard of the accident they rowed to the place where the man had fallen. But in the darkness they could not see him though they could hear his cry for help. At that moment the owner of a yacht happened to be experimenting with his search-light, and he turned it on the surface of the water. The drowning man could then be plainly seen struggling in the water. The light was kept upon him until the rowboat reached his side and he was drawn on board. Perhaps many souls might be saved, if those who are seeking to save them were helped in the same way. Frequently the preacher and the evangelist have to work in the dark, knowing nothing of the difficulties and obstacles which keep those whom they seek to save from coming to Christ. There would be a better prospect of success if they were helped by the prayers and suggestions of those who do know.

Brethren, pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified (11. Thess. 3: 1).

Occupations for Women

V.—PHOTOGRAPHY

HAVE you perhaps, dear older reader, somewhere among your treasures, a little leather case, fastening with a sort of clasp, and opening upon a fading daguerreotype. Fifty years ago, these sun pictures, the invention of a clever French artist, brought in a new era in the reproduction of the human face and form. Portrait and miniature painting still hold their own, and are, as ever, very costly, but step by step, from the little daguerreotype, have come the marvels of the camera, and photography has not yet reached the possibilities which it may develop. On a journey one carries a kodak; every growing boy and girl has an amateur outfit, and women, in some instances, have achieved large success, including generous financial returns, as well as fame, in taking the pictures of sitters, and in illustrating beautiful interiors.

Among the most noted of women photographers is Frances Johnston, of Washington, D. C. Living in the nation's capital city, she has enjoyed superior advantages in the way of photographing distinguished people, and she has been peculiarly happy in capturing that evanescent, fugitive, best expression, which pleases friends when they see it in a picture, and which saves a picture from being wooden. Miss Johnston always succeeds finely in landscape photography, and in portraying delicate gradations of light and shadow. Miss Beatrice Tonnesen, of Chicago, is another successful photographer, and in New York there are so many studios, where women work to perfection, that they are no longer exceptional.

Anybody may take a picture and leave the developing and finishing to others. But when a woman sets out to become a photographer in earnest, she must be prepared to spend laborious days. She need not open a studio, because in many cases it is far better for her to undertake a single branch of the profession and become a photographer's assistant. The highest salaries are paid to the operator and to the one who poses the sitter, but those who do the printing are not badly paid, earning from twelve to eighteen dollars a week. A girl requires an artistic bent, some skill in drawing, and an accurate knowledge of anatomy, before she can be a fairly good photographer.

Any young woman who specializes and devotes herself to the photographing of babies and of little children, will derive much satisfaction from her enterprise. She will win the grateful appreciation of parents, make a good deal of money, and find herself sought by those who hear of her success. Children are always among those whose photographs are frequently taken, as they change so rapidly that parents like to have their pictures at different stages of their lives.

Groups require careful handling and rare skill in composition. Family groups, wedding parties, classes on graduation, and impromptu groups in the summer, when friends picnic and desire a souvenir of some happy day, may all put money in the purse of the lady artist, since many copies of all such groups are sold to interested parties.

After Graduation

The midsummer weeks are brightened by the vacation sports of thousands of young men and women who have been graduated from colleges. Four years of earnest study has entitled them to a respite; but this will be short, and soon they will be absorbed in the work of the period. An increasingly large number of young men go directly from college to business, the old impression that college training unfitted a lad for this having recently lost ground. It is conceded that intellectual discipline is really a fine preparation for the counting room and the office, and a diploma is not a bar to admission there. Many graduates of both sexes will seek a further special training and enter on a learned profession; the ministry, the law, the medical avocation will invite new recruits. Among young women, a number will simply take their places as home daughters, brightening the lives of old people, and bye and bye, going forth to their own homes, to be happy wives and excellent mothers to the next generation.

A Field of Muskmelons

Nature is peculiarly bountiful and affluent in our fruit belts of the Eastern and Middle States, and nowhere is her generosity more evident than in Maryland, where melons flourish and ripen, and help to form the farmer's wealth. The sun itself flavors the lush sweetness of a perfect melon, and in its rare aroma, globular shape and delicate sweetness, it is an unrivalled fruit food. An iced melon on the breakfast table reminds us of the nectar on which the Olympian gods and goddesses were fed. But besides melons, we have peaches, pears, plums, apples, quinces, grapes; an array of fruit such as no other zone produces, for which we should offer God our grateful thanks.

HOLY INNOCENTS

SLEEP, little baby, sleep;
The holy angels love thee,
And guard thy bed, and keep
A blessed watch above thee.
No spirit can come near,
Nor evil beast to harm thee;
Sleep, sweet, devoid of fear,
Where nothing need alarm thee.

The Lord which doth not sleep,
The eternal arms surround thee;
The Shepherd of the sheep
In perfect love hath found thee.
Sleep, through the holy night,
Christ-kept from snare and sorrow,
Until thou wake to light
And love and warmth to-morrow.

ROSETTI'S POEMS.

The Rose Queen

A VERY pretty custom prevails in Nanterre, France, where ever since 1818, the young girl who is elected Queen of the Rose. She is chosen not merely for her beauty, but for the nobility of her character, for her worth and virtue, and the honor conveys more than an empty compliment and the presentation of a fine garland. To the recipient of the annual rose crown the municipality gives out 1,000 francs, part in jewels and garments for her trousseau, including the pen which is a bride's paper outfit, and part in a savings-bank book, where a sum is put down to the young man's credit. Original the gratuity was but 300 francs, but latterly it has been largely augmented, so that it is now a very substantial and coveted prize. The position of queen carries with it some obligations, and the incumbent accepts duties as a matter of course. For one thing, she must attend funerals and marriages in churches, whether or not she knows the people immediately concerned and in fetes throughout the year she must bear her part. On her coronation day, the Rose Queen is escorted from her home by a procession of dignitaries all dressed in their best, and bearing with them curious beribboned halberds, so that the air of the affair is of antiquated distinction. In our new country we have nothing which resembles the medievalism of Europe. There, for centuries are always throwing their glamour over the present.

The Rose Queen is crowned in church, and her attendants are not unlike our pretty maids of honor on a May Day occasion. Whit Monday is the time. First go the various local societies, then follows the crown borne on a cushion; after this are little girls in white frocks, and then the young lady, led gallantly by the mayor. The first sheriff escorts the outgoing Rose Queen, and another official waits on the bridesmaid. The crown is placed on the young girl's head by her godmother. After this, the whole procession passes to the village mayoralty, where the presents and bank-book and the certificate of royalty are given.

The queen of the present year was Marie Louise Constantin, an orphan, aged twenty, very much beloved in the community. She had known peculiar sorrows, but had endeared herself to all by her sweetness and modesty and goodness.

A HAPPY TIME WADING IN THE BROOK

"I'VE GOT A SCOUP"

PICKING WILDFLOWERS IN MONT-LAWN'S MEADOWS

FROM TENEMENT COURTS TO CHILDHOOD'S EDEN

NED, a little cripple, is among the children who at the time of this writing, crowd two big rooms at the Bible House, eagerly waiting to be taken to Mont-Lawn. At the hospital, they have put braces on him and given him a pair of crutches. His garments are poor, but neat. With him is a boy a head taller, and a girl of twelve, who keeps tender watch over Ned. Behind them stands a tall, thin woman, with a baby in her arms. "These are mine," she says, with a proud smile, "and I'm so thankful they can go to the country. It is such a help to me. I go out working every day and have to leave them by themselves. I'm so anxious about them—especially Ned. But Molly's fit good to him; you wouldn't think it, and she's not his own sister. No, ma'am; she was motherless and I took her in. That little boy in front of Ned isn't my son, either. His mother died and I took him in. I couldn't do no ways else. But the Lord helps them that does their duty to the orphan. I'm poorly this hot weather and so is Ned, and I didn't see how I could get along. But now THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes and takes my children to the country. See, how good the Lord is to send help to me!"

In the same crowd are two tiny boys to look like twins. "There are seven children in their family," says the misshapen who brought them. "They are awfully poor. So are all the children here; I could have brought a thousand. You have sent up seventy-five for our society, every one from a poverty-stricken home. When I went into Corria and Morton streets and asked one of two children, 'Do you want to go to the country?' I was quickly surrounded by such a great crowd of small boys and girls that I could hardly walk. They followed after me, begging: 'Can't I go?' and 'Please, ma'am, let me—and my brother—and my sister—and my baby, go!' I couldn't take their names down fast enough, and I had to have a helper."

The illustration on our front page gives the reader some idea of a scene which the writer witnessed when accompanying two Christian workers on their happy mission of inviting tenement waifs to an outing at our Children's Home. "Who wants to go to the country?" the sweet-faced missionary asked. O, how many thin little arms went up! "Have you ever been to Mont-Lawn before?" "Yes, ma'am!" "Yes, ma'am!" came a chorus right and left, and, "O, please, let me go!" and "Please, ma'am, can my little brother (or my little sister) go?" No picture can portray the misery and squalor of the surroundings which our artist has sought to reproduce. None but those who enter them can know how wretched and airless and malodorous are the interiors of these tall tenement houses where the poor, thick as bees in a hive, suffer untold miseries these alike powerless to reproduce the loveliness of the place, the care-free happiness of our children, the faithfulness and tenderness which, in the person of our Housemother and her assistants, guards and blesses our little charges. In the day-time, you will find some wee folk swinging "way up into the trees where the birds and squirrels are;" others clustered about a teacher, listening to a story; others are "jumping the rope"; some are making sand-piles; here and there a little one is having a good nap on the grass; a few unfortunates are painfully carrying stumped toes to Housemother Collins; some lads peep down at you out of the branches of trees which they have climbed; over there, a ring-a-rosy group sings, "All around the mulberry bush"; in the meadows, and on the hills behind the house, merry companies are picking berries or gathering flowers; here comes some little lads and lassies with hats and aprons full of apples. At night, you find in one dormitory a teacher telling a Bible story to a white-robed audience all abed; in another, "teacher" is singing a lullaby; in another all are asleep, and "teacher" is sewing on buttons or darning or patching little garments; in another, "teacher" softly reproves some late comers, while she invests them with night-apparel; and here, in pretty Hope Cottage, sixty little maids abed pipe their evensong, while travelers along the road stop their carriages and wagons to listen to these words, ringing musically over the hills, and coming like an angelic choral from invisible singers:

The day is dying in the West,
Heaven is touching earth with rest;
Wait and worship, while the night
Sets her evening lamp alight,
Through all the sky.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts!
Heaven and earth are full of thee,
Heaven and earth are praising thee,
O, Lord, Most High!

To send one little child from the tenements to beautiful Mont-Lawn costs but $3—that small sum covering transportation back and forth, medical and caretaker's attention, food, shelter, clothing, etc. $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $15 five, and $36 will send twelve. How many waifs will you help to a breath of country air, and a chance for health and life?

A CORNER OF "HOPE COTTAGE" AT BED-TIME HOUR

torrid summer days, when many people living in big, roomy uptown homes, surrounded by every comfort that wealth can procure, are prostrated by heat, and others die from it.

Nearly a thousand children have been transported from such neighborhoods as our picture shows, to our Children's Home on the Hudson—beautiful Mont-Lawn, whose grassy hillsides and flowering fields and running brooks invite childhood to happiness and charm pale cheeks back to health. Readers, all of you who can, go to our Children's Home and see the work for yourself. The camera, the artist's brush and the writer's pen are

God's Requirements

OLD as is the lesson taught in the verses associated with the topic, it is one that needs to be impressed on every generation. There is an apparently incurable propensity to offer God some compromise in the place of the things that he demands of men. The people to whom the words were first addressed were very scrupulous about sacrifices at tithes; we, in our day, think a great deal of orthodoxy, regular attendance at church, and liberal gifts to church causes and philanthropy. All these things are good, but they cannot be substitutes for the one essential thing of walking in God's ways and loving him. There is no sacrifice, no rite, or ceremony, that will take the place of that duty. Men have tried penance, selfmortification and difficult service, but the merit which they hoped to acquire in this way has never satisfied even themselves, and it is very certain it cannot satisfy God. The demand, as it stands, is perfectly reasonable. One can imagine a father addressing such words to his son. If the boy exerted himself to do some extraordinary thing, or spent his pocket money in a present for his father, and yet persistently disobeyed him, we should tell the boy: "You are all wrong. Your father does not require these things that you are doing. He is anxious that you should grow up to be a good and useful man, and to that end he wants you to obey him, and he will so direct your studies and your training as to bring out the best that is in you and develop your powers. You will please him and consult your own interests by submitting to him and lovingly yielding to his wishes." Yet, in dealing with our heavenly Father, we show no such sagacity. We treat God as if he were some despotic sovereign, some hard taskmaster who must be appeased with gifts, lest he be angry and punish us. Nothing can be more certain than the fact that there is no surer way to happiness and peace than in walking in God's ways and obeying him. As this passage says, it is for our good, and so every one has found it who has made the experiment. It is true that with our sin-permeated nature it is difficult, but even that difficulty is met by our loving Father's wisdom, who offers us his help whenever we need it.

Is Any Earnest Prayer Unavailing?

Abraham's Intercession

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST. 18. GEN. 18: 16-33
GOLDEN TEXT—THE EFFECTUAL, FERVENT PRAYER OF A RIGHTEOUS MAN AVAILETH MUCH. JAS. 5: 16

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

ALITTLE girl going to bed unusually weary, shortened her prayer to this: "God bless all I love." Her mother exclaimed, "Aren't you going to pray for little John?" "He's in it," said the child, "for I love him." Some prayers are too short, as others are too long. It is not good for us to cut our too infrequent visits with God down to one sentence, except when many "sentence prayers" are combined. It is as if you should pass an intimate friend with only a hurried "How do?" That friend, it may be said, knows your love, but love will not thrive on such short rations. Prayer is loving conversation, partly for communion, and even in petition we can hardly reach earnest intercession in a hurried moment. Every prayer is too short whose intercession stops with "All I love," as do the prayers that children are usually taught, such as, "God bless papa and mamma and brothers and sisters and all the dear ones." Children should from the first be taught to pray, not for relatives only, but for wicked neighbors; not for those they love only, but for the unlovely and the unfriendly, that God loves and Jesus died to save. They should be taught that each bad man or boy is their bad brother, and each bad woman or girl their bad sister, and both God's bad children, that he would have us help him save. The story of Abraham praying not alone for Lot, but also for all the wicked city of Sodom, teaches this.

At what place was Abraham at the time of this lesson? Still tenting in Hebron, in Southern Palestine, about twenty-five miles from Sodom, with which the lesson has chiefly to do. What was the reputation of Sodom? (Gen. 13: 13). Notwithstanding its bad character, what persons dear to Abraham had gone there to make money? How much time has elapsed since our last lesson? He was seventy years old when God called him to leave his own country, and promised him children that should grow to be a great people in a new land (Gen. 12: 1-3); seventy-five when he left Haran; eighty-four when God renewed his promise in the last lesson; and now, after fifteen years more delay, that must have tried his faith, God sends three angels, with both good and bad news.

It is worth noting in this connection, that these angels had no wings, which is proved by the fact that Abraham took them for human beings. Nor are any Bible angels anywhere said to have wings, except the cherubim and seraphim of heavenly visions, although we read of them flying as in Dan. 9: 21 and Rev. 8: 13 and 14: 6. Nor did those that visited men look like women, as artists have made us think, but like "young men," a fact suggestive of the beauty of a pure young manhood, made in the image of God. Abraham offered generous hospitality to these strangers, and so entertained angels unawares (Heb. 13: 2). In kindness to others, we even entertain him who said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least, ye have done it unto me." Indeed, he was one of those whom Abraham entertained, for their chief was called interchangeably "the angel of the Lord" and "the Lord," that is, Jehovah—a visible Jehovah-Jesus—who had visited Abraham five times, and was seen thirty-three times or more in all by Old Testament saints, to whom God gave these brief visible manifestations of himself, by way of anticipation and preparation and promise of his thirty-three years' visit to man in Christ.

And what are the chief events that outline our lesson story?

- I. The Angels' Messages.
- II. Abraham's Intercession.
- III. The Escape of Lot.
- IV. The Destruction of Sodom.

I. Two messages, as opposite as noon and midnight, the angels brought to Abraham: one, that the son he has been promised for almost thirty years should be born next year; the other, that the judgment day was at hand for unspeakable Sodom and the other cities of the plain of like character, which must be cut away, like a cancer, lest Abraham's land of promise should be corrupted. Abraham forgot the good tidings in his deep solicitude, not alone for his nephew Lot, but also for Sodom itself, which he wept over as Jesus wept over Jerusalem, both of them troubled, not alone that individuals were sinful and so in peril, but also because the business, the politics and the pleasures of the city were unrighteous. We shall probably never have better cities till we learn from the old prophets that highest Christian patriotism that believes God can Christianize, not persons alone, but nations and communities; not individuals only, but social life.

Although Sodom deserved to perish, as if to give it yet more chance, two of the angels are sent to inspect it; not because God needed their report, but to "vindicate the ways of God to man," and show he will not punish hastily even the wickedest. Meantime Abraham "drew near" to the visible Jehovah for his great intercession. We "draw near with faith."

II. Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? The righteous who voluntarily choose to live with the wicked for the sake of making money, in spite of the warning of the first Psalm, may expect, first, to lose something in character, and second, to share in the other losses that wickedness brings. Lot lost both ways, including all the property for which he risked his soul; but God in his mercy saved his life, as the sequel shows. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Aye, and there is small comfort in that for Sodomites, or even for half-hearted Lot in any age. To a trembling prisoner a bystander said, desiring to comfort him: "Do not be troubled—you have a just judge." "That," he replied, "is the very reason I am troubled." In the day of judgment we can not appeal to justice.

Oh, in that day—that dreadful day
When man to judgment wakes from clay—
Be thou, O Christ, the sinner's stay,
Though heaven and earth shall pass away. —DIES IRAE.

In Abraham interceding for Sodom, we behold a feeble picture of Christ interceding for sinners in heaven (I. John 2).

A CARAVAN AT THE PLAIN OF THE JORDAN

Five bleeding wounds he bears,
Received on Calvary;
They pour effectual prayers;
They strongly plead for me:
"Forgive him, O forgive," they cry,
"Nor let the ransomed sinner die."

Abraham's intercession was for the wickedest, and for the wickedest Christ died. He prayed even for his murderers: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do," and his final order to his disciples was that the Gospel should first be preached at Jerusalem. For the salvation of the worst, therefore, we should work and pray.

An earnest London pastor, having vainly argued with five sceptical young men, said: "I shall pray for you five young men by name every day I live." "Do you mean it?" said one. By word and look he assured them he was in earnest. And he won them at last.

When Will R. Moody, son of D. L. Moody, was less than two years old, he was taken sick, and his mother hastened with him out of the Chicago heat into the country air. The next morning at family prayer two lady guests remember how Mr. Moody prayed for his boy's health, and then, amid streaming tears, he added: "Thou Lord alone canst look down the river of time, and if you seest that little Willie is to grow up to dishonor thee, take him now in his innocence." That child of many prayers, who will first know of this prayer when he reads the story here, has lived, and has not dishonored God; but to the contrary, is continuing his father's work.

Not for the unsaved only is intercession needed, but for Christians also, especially when under great trial, as when Jesus said to Peter: "Satan hath desired to have thee that he may sift thee as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not."

I will not destroy it for ten's sake It has been noted that Abraham's prayer was a missionary prayer. In an age when few felt that they were under any obligations even to be just to foreigners, when to conquer rather than convert them was the uppermost thought, Abraham was a "humanitarian" in a broader sense even than its common meaning to-day, loving all men as brothers. The prospective doom even of Sodomites called forth his prolonged intercession, and God promised to save it, if the angels just sent to explore it found righteous persons; then if forty-five, forty, thirty, twenty were found there. It has been said that this last portion would have been met if Lot had even brought up his own household in the fear of God. Ten righteous persons of Lot's kind it would seem, could hardly save the best of but ten men of the stalwart Abrahamic type of righteousness could evangelize almost any city. John Wesley said: "Give me one hundred men who fear nothing but God, and nothing but sin, and are determined to know nothing of Jesus Christ, and him crucified, and I will set the world on fire." In the recent issues of this paper may be found a story of many a wicked city uplifted through even one of two of God's people.

Would God have spared the city for the sake of less than ten, for the sake of Lot's own household only, had Abraham faith continued its plea in persistent prayer? It is a question we cannot answer; but on the face of the returns, it was God's mercy but Abraham's faith that first gave out, this to be put with the unanswered prayers of the Bible, where are so profitable for study? Nay, for God answered as Abraham went in his intercession. At first, the prayer seems an example of persistence, but even Abraham, less he had some sign not recorded in the story, was quite persistent enough.

He feared he would displease God by the persistency of his prayer, though it was due to his love for man and his faith in God. But such sympathy for perishing souls in a human heart is divine nectar. Of all the gold vessels full of odors, which the prayers of saints, such intercessions are the most precious, come spikenard for the feet of the Crucified.

A prize annually given in France to the greatest hero of each year, was recently given to a man who rescued twelve men from a vat filled with deadly odors, into which they himself by which others might draw him out, he was lowered, and dragged out one, then another, and another, each time at the increasing risk of his own life. Thus, to save a man wins highest earthly applause. In heaven, highest honor goes to those who show like devotion in saving the immortal part of man, to those who go as missionaries to malarial coasts, or to the islands of cannibals, or into such infernal ignorance as that of China at a time like this, or into Armenia, still in peril of the Turk and Kurd; or at home, settling slums, where vice, and disease and crime lurk in every alley.

III. The time of prayer passed, the time for judgment was at hand. But the wife of Lot's household, mildewed though it was, must be separated from Sodom's tares before the burning. And so the angels hastened to Lot's home and hurried, almost dragging him and his family out of the doomed city, from which they were "saved as by fire." "Stay not in all the plain," were the angel's orders, reminding us that we are not only to get away from evil things, since it is dangerous even to linger near them. If we would escape the contamination of Sodom, we shall avoid not only sinful but also doubtful amusements. These last are the suburbs of Sodom. Let us get into the hills. There are amusements enough that are above suspicion. Only three of Lot's family escaped—the father and two daughters, that sped on, obeying the injunction, "Linger not behind thee."

IV. The storm of divine wrath was close at hand, and caught the wife, whose corrupted heart led her to linger for a final look.

The city, filled with torches of an idolatrous illumination, seems to have been suddenly shaken by an earthquake, which let loose the columns of petroleum and natural gas that leaped into the air with a furious roar, like a bomb springing upon its prey, and catching fire from the torches and the lightning sent fire also to the inflammable bitumen which had been used to cement the very buildings, as if in preparation for the hell to which they were doomed by the sins of the populace. The fire spread in rivers of petroleum to the slime pits that abounded, and fitly pictured the life of the city, thus cutting off escape on every side (Gomorrah and other cities were sharing the same fate). The volcanic eruptions of saline mud fell over the fleeing people, as Pompeii, and Lot's lingering wife was thus smothered, in that undecaying atmosphere petrified as the centre pillar of salt. "Remember Lot's wife," is a call to the women and men who are halting between two opinions, debating whether they will follow angels or linger with the devilish here, and the devils hereafter. Let our eyes be from Sodom to behold "the purest among the mighty, mightiest among the pure."

YOUNG SUNSHINERS AND THEIR WORK OF LOVE

How little it costs, if we give it a thought,
To make happy some heart each day!
Just one kind word, or a sunny smile,
We go on our daily way.
Perchance a look will suffice to clear
The cloud from a neighbor's face,
And the touch of a hand in sympathy
Removes the tear's sad trace.—MARY D. BRINE.

MARY D. BRINE is a Sunshine member, and she has paid her dues into the Sunshine Society by sending to the office her book of poems, entitled Sunshine. These books she has given away by the hundreds, and much good cheer has been the result.

"How little it costs" to scatter sunshine! The letters that come to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD daily prove this. A most beautiful work is being carried on all over the world through the Sunshine Societies, without great cost financially to any one in particular.

M. Harriet L. Hendrick, of Middletown, N. Y., pays her dues offering to pass on a beautiful collection of books. If she will send them to Mrs. Lulu C. Hooper, President of the affair, N. Y., Sunshine branch, they will be greatly appreciated. Mrs. Hooper is starting a free circulating library for all Sunshiners in Suffern.

M. Reba Tompkins, of Medusa, N. Y., answers one of the questions asked by a Sunshine member, by sending in the following Bible facts:

A y's journey was about twenty-three and one-fifth miles; a Sabbath-day's journey was about an English mile; Ezekiel's reed was nearly eleven feet; a cubit was nearly twenty-two inches; a handbreadth is equal to three and five-eighths inches; a finger's breadth is equal to about one inch; a shekel of silver was about fifty cents; a shekel of gold was eight dollars; a talent of silver was five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and thirty cents; a talent of gold was thirteen thousand eight hundred and nine dollars; a piece of silver a penny, was thirteen cents; a farthing was three cents; a mite is less than a quarter of a cent; a gerah was one cent; an ephor bath, contained seven gallons and five pints; a hin was one gallon and two pints; a firkin was about eight and seven-eighths gallons; an omer was six pints; a cab was three pints.

W. Lucy F. Griffith, of Sacony, Pa., send any choice reading matter to Mr. and Mrs. R. Snell, of Owego, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. Snell are both invalids and will be greatly cheered by any Sunshine contribution.

The following quotation is taken from a letter written by Mrs. A. E. Cunningham, of Newburyport, Mass.: "I would like to do something to bring a little sunshine into the life of some unfortunate one. I think it helps us to forget our own troubles when we try to help others. Can one join a circle in some other town from the one in which he lives?"

Yes, you can join a circle anywhere by signifying your intention to work with that circle. But be sure and have your name enrolled with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD branch, and also at headquarters, 96 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Will Mrs. Cunningham please write to "Aunt Mollie," president of Drake's Branch, Virginia? Aunt Mollie says there are many little children there who need clothing sadly, and if anybody has baby clothes to pass on, Aunt Mollie will see that they are placed where they will bring great comfort.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Christian Endeavor World, so kindly offered by Miss Emily S. Wood, of West Brookfield, Mass., would brighten immensely the life of Mrs. Barbour, care of Mrs. Martha Alden, Montague, Mass., if sent to her regularly. Mrs. Barbour is an invalid. Her only enjoyment in life is reading.

All members are asked to send in clippings that have cheered them in any way and made less dreary the weary hours of the sick room.

Just where you stand in the conflict,
There is your place!
Just where you think you are useless,
Hide not your face,
God placed you there for a purpose,
Whatever it be;
Think he has chosen you for it:
Work loyally.

Gird on your armor! Be faithful
At toil or rest,
Whichever it be, never doubting
God's way is best.
Out in the fight or on picket
Stand firm and true;
This is the work that your Master
Gives you to do.

—HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

Mrs. A. S. Tyler, of North Troy, Maine, offers to write letters to lonely sunshiners, and to send books and papers and

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to anyone wanting reading matter. She has secured seven subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and has started a branch in Troy.

Our sunshine reaches all over the continent. From Sioux Falls, South Dakota, comes a letter from Mrs. S. J. Snyder, telling of the good-cheer work they are doing there. The members are looking after the sick. It makes no difference how poor the sunshiners may be, the well ones are never weary in helping the frail. Will Mrs. Snyder, and anybody else who has silk pieces to spare, send them to Mrs. Goodnow, Newry's Corner, Maine. Mrs. Goodnow is a dear old lady, eighty-five years old. She spends her whole time in making silk quilts. Her last one took a premium at a fair.

Miss Amanda Hurd, of Baraboo, Wisconsin, has started a Cheerful Correspondence Club, and writes letters to the sick who can do little else than read. Please add to your list Miss Grace L. Dyke, of Sebago, Maine.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is being forwarded by Miss Viola G. Daniel, of 207 W. 84th street, New York City, to an invalid friend. This is truly a good way to "pass on" good things. Will she also please write Miss Grace L. Dyke, of Sebago, Maine. Miss Dyke will write a cheery letter for sunshine.

There is Master Latham, of 192 Eastern avenue, New Brunswick, N. J., who craves reading matter and finds it difficult to secure. Mrs. Latham writes that she will be deeply grateful if Miss Sophie G. Gaudland, of South Dennis, N. J., will forward her Youth's Companion to her boy. This little boy is a member in good standing. I will ask Miss Annie O. Moll, of Philadelphia, to send her book to Mrs. B. M. Wood, of Thornhill, Orange county, Va. Mrs. Wood has several boys she is trying to educate, and school-books, or any books that will do for boys, are the truest kind of sunshine for this family.

Will Miss Betts, of Brooklyn, please send her school-books to Mrs. B. M. Wood (address given above), and other books and papers to Mrs. Mary Brooks, of Point Farm, Wide-water, Virginia.

Miss Phebe Grunhap Fox, of Escondido, California, has formed a large branch in her place and forwarded names for enrollment. This is only one of forty branches in California. Miss Emma P. Allen, of Cheshire county, Conn., would greatly like reading matter or letters. I would very much like to have Miss Nellie Bliss, of Compton, Quebec, send good cheer to Mrs. Allen, and also remember occasionally Mrs. Brooks.

THREE AGED CHRISTIANS

In the sermon in a recent issue of this paper, the preacher said he did not know any one a hundred years old. Since then, several correspondents send the pleasant assurance that there are yet two people, a hundred and over, who now read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and several nonagenarians who are its readers. In two instances, portraits accompany the letters. Mrs. G. L. Dunham, Southington, Conn., writes:

My mother, Mrs. Catherine S. Ghost, was born July 27, 1800. Her hundredth birthday was celebrated last year when she received 200 calls of congratulation. The photograph I send you was taken five days before her centennial, and shows her sitting in a chair over a hundred years old, under a large maple tree in front of our home. Although now 101 years old, she enjoys good health. She is quite deaf, however. She talks with a cane. Her mind is quite clear. She says she can't remember as well as she could. She has been a member of the Congregational Church here since 1824. She raised four sons, all professing Christians; three are living; Rev. Samuel Dunham, of Binstanton, N. Y., is the youngest. I am the daughter-in-law who has the care of her. We live on a farm in Southington and have been subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years.

M. Melvin Phipps, Clintonville, Pa., says:

I send the photograph of two venerable ladies the total of whose ages, if they live to their next birthday, will be 189 years. They were born in the same neighborhood, attended the same school, and after marriage, became near neighbors on adjoining farms where they have resided for sixty years. Mrs.

Catherine S. Ghost, although in her ninety-sixth year retains all her faculties. Her hearing is as good as when she was young and she has never used spectacles. She is the mother of seven children, and has twelve grandchildren and sixteen great grandchildren. Within the last few days she walked two miles (going and returning) to visit a sick neighbor. She has been a consistent member of the M. E. Church here for seventy-five years; and when the weather permits is always in her seat. Elizabeth Baird Coulter was born near Clintonville in 1809. She spent her childhood days on the farm and attended an old log school-house, which had split logs for a floor and slabs for seats. In 1840, she married Dr. John Coulter, who died a few years later, leaving her with three little ones of her own and five step-children to bring up. She undertook to manage the farm and provide for the family, and accomplished this very successfully. She has been a member of the Presbyterian Church here for seventy-five years. Her home has been a model one, and she has raised a model family. For miles around she is affectionately known as "Aunt Betsy Coulter" and any report that she was in failing health would be received with sorrow by the entire community.

The combined ages of this venerable trio is 290 years; since one has been a church member for seventy-seven and each of the other two for seventy-five years, the total of their terms of open acknowledgment of the Master is 227 years. Verily, these aged ones are living witnesses to the blessed healthfulness of a righteous life!

Answers to Prayers

E. F. A., Munnsville, N. Y., writes:

A great sorrow came into our home, but God had heard our prayers and helped us more than we could think.

C. E. S., Louisiana, writes:

God has been so good to me. In a recent answer to prayer, a loved one has been brought through a very dangerous trial.

P. W. H., Columbus, Ga., writes:

I recently was greatly troubled and went to God in prayer. I now believe that my prayer has been answered. I wish to add this testimony, hoping it may strengthen some one's faith in prayer, for I feel the testimonials in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have helped me.

L. O. S., Cascade Locks, Ore., writes:

I was in deep distress over the backsliding of a loved one. It looked like a hopeless case, but I prayed daily, almost hourly for his restoration, knowing that God alone could help me. And now my answer has come.

E. P., Preston, Idaho, writes:

I do believe in earnest prayer, for the Lord has heard and answered my prayers time after time. This winter, God has answered prayers in behalf of one of my sons. He was converted and joined the Church, and is reading his Bible daily and praying for others who have gone astray.

B. N., New York, writes:

Having read the answers to prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I was encouraged to more earnest prayer, and I wish to thank God for answering my prayer, and not only one prayer has he answered, but a great many, and I know he is an all-wise and loving Father: God hears and answers prayers.

Moody's Old Colleague Called Home

EDGAR W. HAWLEY, EDITOR AND SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKER, AND EARLY ASSOCIATE OF THE GREAT EVANGELIST, DEAD

BY REV. JOSEPH NEWTON HALLOCK, D.D., Editor "The Christian Work"

It is with a sense of great bereavement and loss that we record the death of Mr. Edgar W. Hawley, who passed away suddenly last week at his residence in Brooklyn. Mr. Hawley was born at Bridgeport, nearly seventy-one years ago, on the second day of September, 1830. His father's name was Bronson and his mother's maiden name Rebecca Burr. He was converted at about seventeen years of age at his old home, and soon afterwards left for the West, where he became an active co-worker with Mr. Dwight L. Moody, during his early life in Chicago. When Mr. Moody was the president of the Young Men's Christian Association in that city, Mr. Hawley was its secretary, and a more intimate and loving companionship than that which existed forty years ago between these two young Christian workers is seldom to be found. The two men were almost constantly together during Mr. Moody's active work along those early years in Chicago; but the tie of comradeship and active interest thus formed was never broken or interrupted. Mr. Hawley often spent his Summer outings with Mr. Moody at Northfield, and assisted him in his religious work there; and this continued until Moody's death.

Not only as an evangelist, but still more widely as an efficient Sunday School worker, Mr. Hawley was favorably known. During the past seventeen years he has been an active and influential member of the Executive Committee of The New York State Sunday School Association. He was accustomed to attend all the conventions of that body, and as the Superintendent of its field work, his counsel was greatly respected and sought after. He was an early advocate of what is known as the Home Department, which has grown to a large membership in Brooklyn and in different cities throughout the State. The membership of this department is made up of those whose age and infirmity prevent them from attending Sunday School, together with such as are shut in because of illness. A regular system of studying the lesson is provided, and a systematic plan of visitation is carried out. In this work, Mr. Hawley was necessarily away from home a large part of the time, as Superintendent of field work of the New York State Sunday School Association, and it was while on duty in this work in Staten Island, during the terrible hot weather lately, that the heat affected him and he was made ill. As showing how suddenly and unexpectedly his death occurred, we may mention that a written message was received by the writer on the day of his death, written only twenty-four hours previous, in which he said he was not feeling very well, but intimated that he expected to be out in a day or two.

Mr. Hawley was for many years a deacon in the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. At the time of Mr. Moody's death, he was invited by his pastor, Rev. Dr. A. J. F. Behrends, to deliver an address from his pulpit upon Mr. Moody and his work, and for an hour he held the large audience of the Central Church spellbound, relating his personal experiences with that noted evangelist. At the time of the memorial services for Dr. Behrends, Mr. Hawley also made a touching address, in which he spoke with great feeling of the severe loss he had personally sustained by the death of his beloved pastor, the great preacher. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, who succeeded Dr. Behrends, found in Mr. Hawley one of his most efficient workers.

It was in connection with his work with this church that Mr. Hawley organized the Bethesda Sunday School Mission. This was about seventeen years ago, and the Mission was under the immediate care and supervision of the Central Church. Until within two or three years, Mr. Hawley remained the Superintendent of this Mission, and the Bethesda Sunday School greatly prospered in numbers and spirituality, and at length became an independent church. It is at present under the care of Rev. Charles Herald, and up to the time of his death Mr. Hawley continued to manifest the liveliest interest in its welfare. In the Sunday School work Mr. Hawley's field of operation was a very large one. Nearly three thousand teachers and a total of between twenty-three and twenty-four thousand pupils were directly under the New York State Sunday School Association, of which Mr. Hawley, as Field Superintendent, had charge, and he never spared himself in caring for them. His services were in constant demand, and there were many times when his strength was unduly taxed. But he loved the work of his Master and gave himself unreservedly to it. He never aimed at eloquence, but his addresses were always full of incidents and practical illustrations, which brought out prominently and impressively the grand old truths of the Gospel and the story of the Saviour's love. He never lost sight of the fact that he was a servant of Jesus Christ and endowed by him with those peculiar gifts and Christian graces which give success to His sincere followers. His long connection with Mr. Moody furnished him with an inexhaustible source of anecdote and illustration in that direction, and was often the means of fixing the attention of both teachers and scholars upon the grand, fundamental truths which Mr. Moody so eloquently and effectually set forth.

It may not be out of place to relate here a single one of these incidents as Mr. Hawley used to tell it. The Committee of the Sunday School Convention for Bureau County, Ill., had on one occasion written to the brethren in Chicago for speakers, and it was arranged that a number of them should go down and help make the Convention interesting. It was therefore advertised that several distinguished speakers from Chicago would be on hand, and Mr. Moody and his friend, Hawley, the Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., set out as two of the lesser lights in the Chicago constellation. Great things were expected from the Chicago men, and an entire afternoon of the greatest day of the meeting had been set apart especially to hear them. None of them materialized, however, except Mr. Moody and his young friend, and Mr. Hawley says: "If ever two poor fellows were frightened, it was Moody and I!"

About two o'clock on a cold March morning they reached the city of Princeton, where the Convention was held, and then they learned what was expected of them. It was too early to sit up and too late to go to bed, and so, shivering with cold and trembling under the load of responsibility thus suddenly laid upon them, they took a room, not for sleep, but for prayer. During the rest of the night they asked God for power and guidance, and in the morning, Mr. Hawley says: "Both of us felt that our prayers were being answered and the smile of heaven warmed and gladdened our souls." And so, trembling, but still relying upon the divine help they had so earnestly asked, they started for the large church. As they neared the church Mr. Moody's spirits began to rise, and seeing a large public schoolroom near by, he at once engaged it for the afternoon.

"What do you want that for?" asked Mr. Hawley.

"I want it for inquiry meetings after we get through," was Mr. Moody's reply.

Mr. Moody told Hawley to speak first, while he prayed for him: they were then to change places, and Moody was to speak, while Hawley prayed. Neither had a clear idea of what they were to say, but their hearts were full, and they trusted the Master to fill their mouths and went ahead.

After Mr. Hawley had spoken for about twenty or twenty-five minutes, Mr. Moody came up and took his place. Soon he had the entire audience in tears. Mr. Hawley said he spoke like one inspired, and after an address of three quarters of an hour, which he poured forth with a vehemence and earnestness that seemed almost like a wild mountain torrent, and during which he never hesitated a moment for a word, Mr. Moody called for those who wanted to find their Saviour to come over with him at once into the public schoolroom which he had engaged. Great numbers of inquirers accepted his invitation, and this was the beginning of that widespread revival in Bureau County, which was long remembered as a special outpouring of the Spirit, and which was really the beginning of the new life for Moody.

At one time Mr. Hawley was the publisher of The Christian at Work, succeeding General Horatio C. King, away back in the seventies. His connection with this paper was continued until his death, and he was greatly beloved by all of the employees. Until a year or two ago, he was responsible for the publishing of the four Sunday School papers connected with The Christian Work, namely, Good Words, Good Cheer, My Paper and Rays of Light; but his duties as Field Superintendent of the New York State Sunday School Association led him to relinquish the charge of these papers, and they were absorbed by The Christian Work.

The funeral services were held in the chapel of the Central Congregational Church last week, on Thursday evening, and a service was also held at his old home where he was born, corner Main and Franklin streets in Bridgeport, Conn. Both of these services were conducted by Rev. Willard P. Harmon, assisted by Rev. Dr. Frank Russell, of Bridgeport, and others. The Interment took place on Friday last, when all that was mortal was laid to rest in the presence of a large circle of sorrowing friends, in the beautiful cemetery of his own native city.

And now, with a suddenness almost as startling as the appearance of a chariot of fire, our friend and Christian brother has gone from our midst. God has bidden his faithful servant "Come up higher!" He has entered upon that rest which remaineth for all the people of God. And his works do follow him.

Have we Walked in the Garden?

HAVE we walked in the garden with Jesus, His anguish and grief have we known, When friends and disciples forsook him And he walked in the garden alone?

Have we drunk of the cup that was bitter, Have we uttered that heart-broken cry, "Thy will, be it done—O my Father," Though we'd fain pass the bitter cup by?

Have we stood calm and firm, never flinching, Has our faith never wavered nor died; Hath Gethsemane made our souls braver— Like him, can we be crucified?

If so, then blest be life's anguish, All struggles and burdens we meet. Thrice blest be our lives if we conquer And never acknowledge defeat.

For the soul is great, but as it rises Undismayed by the chastening rod, Unfurl, then, the flag of the victors, Let us live, crying, "Heroes for God!"

—CAROLYN HOWARD.

SURE TO ASK.

The Kind of Coffee When Postum is Made.

"Three great coffee drinkers were my school friend and her two daughters.

They are always complaining and taking medicine. I determined to give them Postum Food Coffee instead of coffee when I visited me, so without saying anything to them about it, I made a big pot of Postum the first morning, using four heaping teaspoons to the pint of water and let it boil two minutes, stirring down occasionally.

Before the meal was half over, each passed up the cup to be refilled, remarking how fine the coffee was. The mother asked for a third cup and inquired as to the brand of coffee I used. I didn't answer her question just then, for I had heard her say a while before that she didn't like Postum Food Coffee unless it was more than half old-fashioned coffee.

After breakfast I told her that the coffee she liked so well at breakfast was pure Postum Food Coffee, and the reason she liked it so much because it was properly made, that is, it was boiled long enough to bring out the flavor. I have been brought up from a nervous, weakened invalid, to a fine condition of physical health by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee.

I am doing all I can to help the world free of coffee slavery, to Postum freedom. I have earned the gratitude of many, my friends." Myra J. Tuller, 1023 Troost Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

GAVE HIS HEART AS A CHILD

How Rev. F. B. Meyer, the Well-known English Preacher and Evangelist Became a Christian

...BY...
REV. LOUIS
ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

FREDERICK W. ROBERTSON, of Brighton, in one of the most splendid of those wonderful sermons fragments, which has been saved from the ministry of that remarkable man, disses with rare spiritual insight the experience of those souls that are born into Christian families, and are so guarded and taught with spiritual fidelity and wisdom that from their earliest remembrance the spiritual life is as natural to them as a physical atmosphere they breathe. Robertson says that we are likely to misunderstand such people, for we are accustomed only to count the shocks in our journey; and if there has been no sudden conversion, no impetuous and tumultuous feeling of reconciliation, you may speak to sinners of what are called "religious experiences," but they have very little account to give you. And this is the history sometimes of those who have been nurtured in religious families. They have imbibed the atmosphere of religion without knowing it; and so they go on loving God quietly, unostentatiously, doing simple duties happily, without speaking of them until duty has become a habit and religion has become the very element of life.

I have met many, during my ministry, who were confused at hearing the testimony of those who had been "snatched as 'hands from the burning'" late in life, and are sometimes cast down because they had never known the rapturous joy experienced by the returning prodigal. I think it is well for us to lay emphasis rather than we do, upon this great truth which Robertson emphasizes, that serenity and pure-heartedness are the kind of peace that has most of heaven. It is better than religious rapture. The rapture that comes from pardoned guilt is like the fire that streams and blazes through the black sky, making everything brilliant for a moment, and forcing men to look at it; the peace of one who has lived near to God is like the quiet, steady lustre of the kerosene lamp; startling no one, very easily mistaken for a common light, but never quenched; ever to be found when wanted; casting the same mild ray through the long night, across the maddest mists that curl their crests around the rock on which it stands. That is the peace enjoyed by the soul that is born into the kingdom by inheritance, and cons to the love of God in its very infancy, as the flowers in the springtime are to the gentle showers and the warm breeze and the kiss of the sun.

I have laid such emphasis on this, because it is not often that I have so conspicuous an example to illustrate a statement, as I have in this case.

By common consent the Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, stands in the very forefront of the great spiritual leaders of our day. There have been other men who have been more widely used of God in attracting the multitude of the unconverted, and in calling sinners to repentance; but I doubt if any man in a generation has been a greater blessing to the Church itself. All who hear Mr. Meyer, or who read his books, feel that he is an earnest devoted personality, owned and blessed by the Holy Ghost. No one can look in his face, and listen to his message, without feeling that it is a message from God. He has been on the Mount with the Lord, has beheld the transfigured glory, and has come down to the common struggles of men's lives with the strength, and the spiritual insight, which came to him on the Mount of Transfiguration.

For the comfort of Christian fathers and mothers, who have a longing to so dedicate their children to God, and to so guard them by their own consecrated lives, that they shall "Sow no wild oats," never know the defilement of sin, but grow up from their childhood as the children of God, I want to give you this very beautiful window into the heart and career of one of the most spiritual and most useful of all the ambassadors of Jesus Christ living to-day. Here is Mr. Meyer's answer, in his own words, to the query, "How did you find Christ?"

"My dear sir:—

I do not remember when first I became a Christian. The love of God came over me, as the dawn over a summer sky; and it was only in after years that I realized what God had done for me in those early days.

My mother and father were godly people. They expected me to be a Christian, and at my mother's knee I said my morning and evening prayers. It is to their prayer and faith and unremitting care, that I owe everything.

With warm regards,
Very sincerely,
F. B. MEYER."

THE PRAYER OF FAITH

The Prepared Servant of God Interceding for the Sinful and Corrupt City

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

BEFORE Abraham could stand with God for others, he must pass his own examinations in God's school. It was not enough that he should learn obedience to the call of God when he appeared to him in Ur of the Chaldees; he might have prided himself upon his heroic self-denial in leaving home and country, and have become great in his own eyes. He must also learn his own weakness, and learn to be ashamed, through his experience in Egypt. He must know that the greatness of God's grace towards him, in his promises when Lot left him, and also after his rescue of Lot and the king of Sodom, was wholly unmerited; for the temptation

GRAPE-NUTS AND CREAM.

An Ideal Hot Weather Breakfast.

The selection of food for hot weather is an important question. We should avoid an excess of fats, cut down the butter ration and indulge more freely in fruits and food easy of digestion. One meat meal per day is sufficient during hot weather.

An ideal breakfast is Grape-Nuts, treated with a little cream (which, by the way, supplies the necessary fat in a very digestible form) a cup of Postum Cereal Food Coffee, hot, or if cold, it should have a little lemon juice squeezed in; then some fruit, either cooked or raw; also perhaps two slices of entire wheat bread with a very thin spread of butter. A breakfast of this sort is so perfectly adapted to the wants of the system that one goes through the heat of the day in comfort as compared with the sweaty, disagreeable condition of one improperly fed. Once put in practice, the plan will never be abandoned during the hot days, for the difference in one's personal comfort is too great to be easily forgotten.

which Sarai presented to him (Gen. 16), found him still capable of distrusting God. "The father of them that believe" must learn, as all his children after him, the lesson of habitual confidence in God. It takes time, and often repeated failure, before we learn the lesson of trusting everything out of our own hands into the hands of God.

Abraham had believed when everything had looked most impossible; now God could treat him as a friend, and open his heart to him about the crying sin of Sodom. God told Abraham how the cry of the wicked cities had come unto him, and how he would go down and see whether they had done "according to the cry of it," which had come up to him. It was an awful moment for Abraham. His nephew Lot had chosen his habitation "toward Sodom." Once he had been rescued from the danger in which he had been involved with the king of Sodom, but business was too good in these haunts of wickedness for so keen a man of business as Lot was to forsake the place; and though "he vexed his righteous soul from day to day" with the unspeakable wickedness which surrounded him (II. Pet. 2: 7, 8), yet he could not make up his mind to give up his position and his business, and to become a stranger upon earth, as his uncle had done.

Two of the men who had appeared to Abraham had risen up and were gone on their mission of judgment toward Sodom; but "Abraham stood yet before the Lord." It is such as have learned the secret to stand before the Lord, seeing, hearing all, in relation to him, that he can trust to be intercessors for others, and to prevail. Abraham could see the messengers depart, and yet begin to intercede for Sodom. Every moment saw them nearing the doomed city; but Abraham did not take for granted that all was lost. Yet he did not see as God saw; he thought there might possibly be in that wicked city "fifty righteous," and if so, would not God spare the city for the sake of the fifty righteous? He asked the question where alone it could be answered, and God replied that if he should find there fifty righteous he would spare the city for their sake. Abraham's prayer ended with the words, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" and this portion of his prayer was answered. God did right. Abraham renewed his petition, lessening by five the number of the supposed righteous, the supposed fruit of Lot's influence there, and still he did not prevail: forty-five righteous were not to be found there. Then thirty, then twenty, then ten.

Abraham knew how far he might go. While he prayed, the terrible state of the city was revealed to him by the answers he received from God. One who knows God will never willingly pray a prayer which is not a prayer of faith. One who is acquainted with the holiness, the perfect wisdom, and the unflinching faithfulness of God, cannot try experiments with him. He would shrink from the irreverence which admits of making requests to the Most High for something in which he neither consults the interests, nor the revealed will of God, but only his own desires. A man who knows God first considers whether his request is to the glory of his God, whether it can fulfil his revealed will; and whether, therefore, he can quietly, but surely, claim the answer (I. John 5: 14, 15). It is a God-dishonoring way of praying, when a child of God tries to get his own will by praying for what he wishes, and then adds the words, "If it be thy will," without taking the trouble to ascertain what the will of God really is.

Abraham knew how far he might go. There is a kind of holy check put upon our prayers when we are fully in the will of God, and are asking something in which his will is not yet revealed. God heard Abraham; his prayer was not in vain, and yet Sodom must be destroyed; this hotbed of sin must no longer defile the earth. But all that could be saved out of Sodom was saved. When the two angels came to the doomed city, they first warned Lot, and laid hands on him and all his family who were willing to escape. There was a deep meaning in the words, the message of God brought to him by the angels, "Haste thee; escape thither (into Zoar); for I cannot do anything till thou come thither." "I cannot!" and God is the Speaker! I cannot go against a prayer of faith.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Sept. 11

1. An active Christian worker in Wyoming, writes: "There are two wives of saloon-keepers and a young drug store clerk (who tends a bar in the rear of the drug store), who are being considered as candidates for our C. E. Society. Is it right to accept such people as associate members and to endeavor to surround them with better influences, or should our society decline them as liable to give the work a bad name? What are we working for if not to help sinners, and in what better way can we do this than by bringing them in? I am President of our C. E. Society. Please advise me." We ask our readers to state what course the President should adopt in this case.

2. What is the meaning or interpretation symbolical, historical, allegorical or otherwise, of the pyramid and the eagle on the great seal of the United States?

3. Should a husband point out her faults to his wife?

4. What should be done with the member of the church who by his inconsistencies keeps others out?

5. What verb is used in the Bible in relation to Divine wrath, the Holy Spirit, love, life and temptation? Name the passages in which it is used?

Questions of the Week

1. A rich, childless wife, would love to adopt a little one, but distrusts her own capacity to train it. She could give it love, and even indulgence, but dreads what might prove an unwise experiment. Or she might train it by proxy, but she would then miss the love that comes from personal contact. What should she do?

I think if this woman would take some little orphan children and bring them up, as there are so many orphan children that need a home like this, that the world would be the gainer for it. If she distrusts her own capacity to train them, she certainly is the woman to train children, rather than a woman that thinks she is doing right in everything in training a child, for she is one that will think before she acts. I would like to have her try two, as there is not so much possibility of her spoiling two as there is one in a place of wealth and indulgence. There are so many who would appreciate a home like this, that she would have a return of their love and respect, and if she will ask God to help her train these children and to put a love for God into their hearts, she will be helping the next generation on to a more perfect Christian world. "My son, give me thine heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways." Prov. 23: 26.

NORA BACON.

Certainly, adopt the child, or by all means take one into your home as a little friend and visitor; thus by personal contact ascertain if the child be congenial and interesting to you. A temperament that suits your friend may not perchance suit you, and vice versa, but in a world filled with lonely-hearted children, surely you can find one whose life may be made useful by your gift of mother-love? I would not put so much stress upon the final outcome; just begin to-day with your care and mothering and thoughtful interest in all that pertains to the little one's life, to-morrow the same, and so on to the time when the child has become a man or woman. When perchance they may not measure up to your standard of right living, think what they might have been without your watchful care and love, and be glad in your heart that you have done what you could. If every childless home would take into its sheltering fold a homeless child, the experiment could not prove an unwise one. If you have in your mind an individual case that was not a satisfactory one, banish it, and dwell in thought upon the many lonely hearts to cherish as the days are going by, and believing the promise is yours: "For as much as ye have done it unto one of these my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

MRS. ISABEL CARPENTER.

It may be, and very likely is, her mission—the special work God has assigned her—to train up this young immortal. Let her take it to her heart, and do her part with joy and gladness, never doubting that the blessing will follow. Companionship with the pure soul of a child is what keeps the heart fresh and sweet to the end of life. Without such contact, we miss that rejuvenation which comes like a second youth to those who are surrounded by little ones whom they love. It keeps the heart-springs fresh, banishes selfishness, and fills life with pure enjoyment to the very close. To "see our children's children" is one of the richest blessings we can experience in this world. On the other hand, the childless and lonely one misses more than half the delight of living. The affections, only occasionally stirred by older companionships, at last turn back on themselves, the fountains of the heart grow dry, and existence becomes barren and monotonous—such at least is the experience in many childless homes. Take the child, train it, love it, lead it in pure, spiritual paths, and leave the rest

2. Who made, and who wore the first artificial limb on record, and what were the circumstances connected with it?

We are told by Herodotus of a prisoner who, to escape from his shackles, cut off his foot. He reached his friends, who provided him with a wooden substitute. M. Sergius, the great-grandfather of Catiline, and who was consul 167 B.C., lost his right hand and received many wounds, so that neither his left hand nor his feet were very serviceable. Yet he fought in four battles with his left hand only. Then he made himself an iron hand, and, fighting with it fastened on, was helpful in raising the siege of Cremona, in defending Placentia and in storming twelve camps in Gaul during the second Punic war. What is known as the "Roman artificial leg" was discovered in a tomb at Capua with other relics, dating from 300 B.C. This relic, it is said, accurately represents the form of a leg, and is made of bronze plates over a wooden core. The artificial hand of the German knight, "Gotz of the Iron Hand," was made by a mechanic of Nuremberg in 1504. It weighed three pounds, and could grasp a sword or lance. Thomas Johnson, in 1605, translated Pare's Œuvres de Chirurgie, and described how artificial limbs of all kinds could be made. Till the beginning of the last century, that work was recognized as the best on the subject.

JAMES B. JOHNSON.

tend greatly to develop his spiritual life. He must, however, be careful to travel only in company of Christian people, so as to himself to withstand the temptations which he must surely battle, whether in a boarding-house or private family. While it may appear to be more advantageous to be with a religious family, after awhile he is able to get a feeling of security, owing not having to keep that sharp watch against temptation he would have to in the boarding-house, and thus become more susceptible to the wiles of the Evil One. Even in a religious family he might come into contact with tation, which, being all the more unexpected, might more quickly draw him away from his better life. In the boarding house, knowing that every eye is watching him, he is more on his guard, and strive more earnestly to fashion his life after the pattern of his Master's. Without doubt the boarding-house will prove the better school.

5. Is children's day, as usually observed, a benefit to the Church?

Children's day is of real and permanent benefit to the Church when it is so observed as to impart instruction with reference to the Sunday School features of Church work, and the part which the Sunday School, and especially the children, may take in developing the missionary idea and cultivating the graces and beauties of Christianity. As it is "usually observed" in many churches, this is accomplished, and a tangible benefit for the present and the future will be realized by the Church. But it is "usually observed" by some churches with a great deal of display, fancy dressings, theatricals and ostentatious exhibitions of the decorator's art—this is not done to positive spiritual injury to the children, but so to the Church ultimately, is accomplished.

B. F. WHITTELL.

Miscellaneous Questions

C. W. Cumberland, Md. 1. Why do they vote in Washington, D. C.? 2. How did the dress of Liberty originate? 3. The title "E pluribus unum"?

1. Because Washington, as our National Capital, belongs not to the people who may happen to be living there, but to the nation, and it is dealt with strictly as a Federal session under the authority of the President and Congress. The President appoints a commission consisting of three members, who, after the approval of the Senate, are empowered to manage the affairs of the District. In ancient mythology, almost all peoples have had a god or goddess of money. As used in modern heraldry, the figure is purely symbolical and has no religious significance, of course. 3. E pluribus unum, a place on our coins because it is our national motto. The meaning is: "Out of many, one."

Mrs. S. B., Little Rock, Ark. At what did Paul visit Rome, and how long did he stay there?

According to the best available information, the shipwreck occurred in the year 60, and late in the autumn of that year he reached Rome as a prisoner. The length of his stay is uncertain. Acts 28: 30, says, "years, and the author probably knew, events, he knew as much about it as it is probable that he was then set at liberty and made another preaching tour farther west than before. He was again seized and taken back to Rome long elapsed between his second arrest and his execution there no one knows.

The "Industrial Edition" of The Sunday School, published at Columbia, S. C., is a mammoth, finely illustrated, and representative of the highest sense of the prosperity of the South and the North generally.

With reference to a recent inquiry, omnia Cook & Son, the well known tourist agency, write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the railroad operation at the present time in Palestine and Syria, are those from Jaffa to Jerusalem, a from Beyrout to Damascus, while a railroad is being constructed between Damascus and Jerusalem.

Minnie F., Elm Grove, Ky. We never saw politics in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Henry S., Akron, O. If the perjury is proved, it is punishable, of course. We do not see that the Church has jurisdiction in the matter.

Baptist, Plainfield, N. H. 1. We cannot understand how hypnotism could be used in connection with Christian work; the idea seems absurd. Certainly not. To argue that if you did it with liquor, somebody else would, is sophistry and no justification at all.

with the great Father, whose children we all are, and he will crown your loving labor with joy and blessing.

MARIA AYLMER.

Come to me, oh, ye children,
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplex me
Have vanished quite away.

Take the child to her home and her heart, trusting to our heavenly Father for the outcome. Asking him daily, yea hourly, for help and wisdom to train the child aright. If she should fail in making a good man or woman of the child, she would do no worse than thousands of parents do by their own children. And there is the comforting promise that if we train up a child in the way he should go, when he is old he will not depart from it. Should she take the child she would reap a rich blessing from its daily companionship, and the knowledge that she is doing this work for the Master. I believe if I had the means to care for them, that there is nothing I would rather do than to fill my home with children and try to save them for our blessed Lord.

What were the world without children?
Only a dreary waste;
With the dreaded desert before us,
Worse than the one we have passed.

THE GREAT CAMP-MEETING WHICH OPENS THIS WEEK AT OCEAN GROVE

IT is doubtful whether a more unique and enlivening spectacle could be witnessed in any part of the globe than that which is presented at Ocean Grove, on the New Jersey coast, this week. This quaint little town, with a normal population of only a few thousand souls, assumes a size and importance, as summer advances, until its teeming population alone would fairly entitle it to rank with cities of considerable magnitude. From all parts of the Union people flock thither, representing almost every denomination of the Protestant faith, for Ocean Grove is truly cosmopolitan in this respect. Among the occupants of cottages, boarding houses, hotels, and even among its long rows of white tents, gleaming like Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association, having charge of the temporal interests of the people as well as their spiritual leader. He is probably the busiest man on the grounds, and is constantly in request, either to preside at some meeting or for advisement concerning some of the thousand-and-one problems that arise in the course of the work. He meets and greets all visitors of importance, is courtly, gentle and affable, accessible to and respected and beloved by all.

Among those who are also recognized as leaders in the spiritual work at Ocean Grove, are the Rev. C. H. Yatman, the well-known evangelist; Dr. Hanlon, whose Bible class is of national fame; the Rev. A. E. Ballard, D.D., Vice-President of the Association, and Prof. Tali Esson Morgan, the most successful and popular musical in cool, picturesque places, and Pilgrim Pathway, and indeed all the thoroughfares leading to the big Auditorium, are crowded with worshipers.

Music is this year more than ever before a potent attraction at the Grove. Under Professor Morgan's skilled leadership, a new impetus has been given to the higher class of sacred music, which must make itself widely felt in congregational singing. His grand chorus of hundreds of trained voices and his large orchestra have been a real revelation to the music-lovers who were accustomed to the old-time methods. Never has praise ascended from the old camp ground in such volume of sweet sounds. The programme for the Camp-Meeting, stated briefly, is as follows:

On August 17, there will be a Prayer Service in the

and in the bright sunshine, one can find followers of almost every creed known to Christendom, all enjoying the rest, recreation, and recuperation the place affords, and a great majority of them attending the religious services with apparently equal zest and spiritual profit.

It is as the Mecca of American Methodism that the Grove is chiefly known. Of the great multitude now assembled there—it is believed that they may number anywhere between 50,000 and 65,000—Methodists are largely in the majority. Bishops, pastors of all degrees, evangelists, class leaders, and laymen active in religious work are everywhere in evidence. The General in command of this great army of workers and worshipers by the seashore is Bishop J. N. FitzGerald, D.D., LL.D., who acts in a dual capacity,—being President of the director who has ever led choir or orchestra in the Auditorium. There are many others, including several talented Christian women, who take a prominent part in the camp meeting and general religious work during the summer. Leading pastors of various denominations from a number of States, assist in the work during the season. Indeed, the entire machinery is so admirably regulated, and the various departments so well officered, that the Grove might be taken as a model for religious assemblages the world over.

This week the Annual Camp-Meeting opens, the first service taking place in the Auditorium on Saturday evening next. It is expected that the population of the little seaside city will be immensely increased while the meeting lasts. Row after row of new tents has arisen Auditorium from 10.30 to 11.30 A.M., when the great building will be crowded to its utmost capacity by a vast audience. From 3 o'clock to 4 o'clock P.M., a Workers' Consecration Meeting will be held in the Tabernacle. At 7.45 P.M., the ordinance of the Lord's Supper will be observed in the Auditorium, Bishop FitzGerald presiding.

On August 18 (the opening Sabbath of the Camp-Meeting), the Rev. Courtland Myers, pastor of the Baptist Memorial Temple, Brooklyn, will preach at 10.30 o'clock A.M., and in the evening, at 7.30 o'clock P.M.; Bible Class in the Auditorium, the Rev. THE GOSPEL IN A NOTORIOUS DIVE

The Haymarket, in New York's Tenderloin, Echoes the Sound of Gospel Invitation and Singing

A STRANGE spectacle was witnessed in New York on Sunday, July 28. It was a religious service in the old Haymarket, on Sixth avenue, a resort which has been a scandal to the city for many a year. Time and again the hall has been raided. At times it has been closed for weeks together, by the efforts of reformers, but it has blossomed out again in its old character, and is still being used as a meeting-place by vicious people of both sexes. The building will hold about a thousand persons. A piano occupies a place on the stage and occasionally there is a band for gala occasions. As in other places in the neighborhood, there is no open incitement to evil, save in the sale of intoxicants, which is always a fruitful source of wickedness of all kinds, but it has become notorious by reason of the character of the persons who have made it their nightly resort.

It was in this building that the religious service was held on July 28. Mr. Joseph Jones, who has been holding services every night in the Cremorne Mission, which was established by Jerry McAuley, knows the neighborhood thoroughly, and had seen the crowds passing in and out of the Haymarket at all hours. They were the kind of people whom he is trying to save, and it occurred to him that as the Haymarket is now closed on a Sunday, the people who throng it every other night in the week could perhaps be induced to come on the Sunday night. Application was made to "Ed" Corey, the proprietor of the Hall, for permission to hold a Gospel service there on Sunday night, and he referred the applicant to Police Commissioner Devery. Mr. Devery heartily approved of the project, and promised to see Corey. The way being thus smoothed, Mr. Corey offered the hall free, and promised that there should be no lights and every facility for the service. The preachers, he said, might occupy the place every Sunday night for one or two months.

It was a genuine surprise to the habitués of the place to see it lighted up on a Sunday night. It had been understood that on that night, in deference to public opinion and the Committee on the doors would be closed. Any of them went in and were astonished to see the transformation. Chairs had been collected and put in the space usually left clear for dancing, and on the stage, instead of the regular occupants, was an earnest preacher proclaiming the Gospel message. There was music, as usual; but in place of "ragtime" there were the sweet strains of a Gospel hymn, which must have recalled to many the pure memories of homes deserted and loved voices now silent in the grave. Most of the seats were occupied by people attracted by curiosity, or by the hope of supporting and encouraging the work. Mr. Jones, however, addressed the crowd, stating what it was hoped to accomplish, and Major George H. Hilton and Mr. Smith, of the Y. M. C. A., spoke earnestly of God's readiness to forgive the sinner. The audience listened attentively, and the meeting closed with an earnest prayer for God's blessing on the effort. It is hoped that now a beginning has been made, it will be possible to get some of the women who throng the hall on week evenings to attend on Sunday nights, and to plead with them the claim of him who said to the woman in sin, "Go and sin no more."

Primary, held in the Tabernacle at 2.30 P.M., Mrs. W. H. Skirm, Leader; Beach-Meeting at foot of Ocean Pathway, 6 o'clock P.M.

On August 19, regular Camp-Meeting services will begin. These will continue every day until Sept. 2, the names of the preachers to be announced daily in advance of the services.

On Sunday, August 25, the Rev. Joseph Smith, D.D., will preach. Jack and Hayden Cooke, of England, will assist during ten days of the meeting. Rev. Dr. Smith will lead the services during the last ten days.

On Sunday, Sept. 1, at 9 A.M., the Annual Camp-Meeting Love Feast will take place, when addresses will be made by a number of eminent speakers. This is always a season of rejoicing and spiritual refreshing.

During the entire Camp-Meeting, from Aug. 17 to Sept. 2, when it closes, these meetings and services will be held: Sunrise Services in the Tabernacle (5.45 to 6 A.M.); Family Prayer in the Auditorium (6.45 to 7 A.M.); Helping Hand Fellowship Meetings in Thornley Chapel, Rev. Wm. Franklin, Leader (9 A.M.); Holiness Meeting in the Tabernacle (9 A.M.); Young People's Meeting in the Temple, Rev. C. H. Yatman, Leader (9 A.M.); Children's Consecration Meeting in the Temple, Mrs. Carrie Thompson, Leader; Associate Leader, Samuel Thompson, Superintendent of State Junior Leagues (3.30 P.M.); Twilight Meeting in the Temple, Rev. C. H. Yatman, Leader (6 P.M.).

There are numerous social attractions at the Grove, in addition to its religious life, and these lend a variety to the experiences of the "dwellers by the sea." Patriotic days are never overlooked and all such occasions are fitly celebrated. Then there are still other features, more particularly connected with the work of the King's Daughters, the W. C. T. U., the Summer School Excursions, Floral Day, Tree Planting Day, in all of which the summer population take active part. Of course, as all the world knows, the latitude which prevails at the usual summer resort is unknown at Ocean Grove, but far from acting as a damper upon the pleasure of the multitude, the rules which have been adopted as moral and social safeguards are everywhere commended and gladly upheld.

In addressing the residents who celebrated the twenty-second anniversary of the founding of Ocean Grove on Wednesday, the Rev. C. H. Yatman intimated that in the near future Ocean Grove would have a four in of a two months' season. "Thirty-two years of history has secured an ideal Ocean Grove," he said. "The cottages, the hotels, the religious services, and the clean, moral life, will continue to attract the people."

N AMERICAN LADY'S IMPRESSIONS OF BURMAH AND ITS PEOPLE ... BEGINNING MISSIONARY WORK THERE*

WHEN the Winifredian turned her bow from the Boston docks, where hundreds of friends stood in a drizzling October rain, waving, singing and shouting good-bys, she faced a stormy, overshadowed sea. The temperature was unusually mild for the season. We had but one day of a really rough sea. Upon our arrival in Liverpool our big party separated, as the India and Assam missionaries sailed a week sooner by another route. Our Burmah party also divided, as some were to cross France and join us at Marseilles.

We sailed from Liverpool on board the Cheshire, passed through Biscay Bay without serious discomfort, and passed Gibraltar about 4.30 on a bright moonlight morning. The coast of Morocco was near on our right. Our voyage over the "Blue Mediterranean" was not as pleasant as anticipated, as we had cloudy weather. We went through the Straits of Bonifacio, past the volcano of Stromboli, down the beautiful Italian coast and through the Straits of Messina. We had a brief stop in Port Said—that wicked, dreary city; and that evening, as we lay in dock, Paul Kruger's passage, passed us, carrying him to Holland. Next day we passed through the Suez Canal. About two o'clock, Nov. 26, we cast anchor in the Harbor of Colombo, Ceylon. How beautiful the shore looked, with its tall palm trees and picturesque houses! We had a day and a half in that interesting place—well worth crossing oceans to see! Marcus and I did not go in jinrikishas; we secured a victoria and had some delightful, never-to-be-forgotten drives. We drove seven miles to see a famous Buddhist temple and visited several large missions.

We sailed up the Rangoon River Dec. 3 and were met by a welcoming party, who, waving a small American flag, announced themselves, and gave us the feeling that we were still among friends. We were soon on board their launch and were taken ashore, where we separated, to find pleasant entertainment with our dear Rangoon people. In the evening we were given a pleasant reception, many missionaries coming from various stations to meet arriving friends. I alone was a stranger, but I soon found many friends. If first impressions are lasting, I will certainly love Burmah as well as many others who have spent the best of their lives here.

Ten days later, we left for Tunngoo, where we remained till after New Year's Day. Another all night railroad journey brought us to Thazie, where we found our lodgings, and spent two days loading bullock carts. On the evening of January 5, we began our long jungle journey. We were unable to get riding ponies, so we walked most of the time for the first two weeks, covering a stage of about ten miles each day, and resting in the convenient bungalows built by English for officials and other travelers. We made two brief halts, then, at Monie, had a two weeks' visit with mission friends. The rest of the journey was toilsome and difficult. The cart-road ending, we transferred our goods to pack bullocks, mules and coolies, and mounted riding ponies. We now pursued our journey by narrow, often dangerous, mountain mule-paths, traveling slightly northeast, to the Salween River, then almost due east one hundred miles. The scenery and vegetation were beautiful, but we were sometimes too tired to appreciate them. We reached Keng-Tung, February 26. It was weeks before I felt rested, but we begun at once to look for a suitable site. After much walking and consultation with the English officers—who have been very kind and helpful—we found an excellent compound, high and level, just within the principal gate. The view to the northwest is magnificent, though the high city wall spoils our view of the valley in other directions; but we can see the mountains on every side. We are hastening to complete our buildings before the rains, which have already begun, become heavy and steady. Marcus has overworked and has not been able to be with the men all of the time for the last two weeks.

Keng-Tung State has a population of 190,000, the city within the walls 11,000, and the surrounding valley 40,000. This is large for such an isolated mountain state. There is much wealth, and also wretched poverty. Slavery for debt existed when the English first came here. The better classes live in substantial houses of brick, tile and wood, and dress nicely, often richly. The women and children are often quite pretty, notwithstanding the blackened teeth and slits in the ears. The poorer houses are of bamboo and grass. There are many natural resources little appreciated by the natives, who are good-natured, easy-going, and know little of the great busy world beyond their mountain walls. They are as light in complexion as the Chinese, to whom they are related. They seem bright, but are like untaught children; few can read and write.

The little Burman boys are put into the monasteries for education, but the lazy, worthless priests do little for them. There are about a thousand of these Buddhist monasteries in the state. Large sums are lavished upon the buildings, gilded pagodas, the images, and the priests. Buddhism is of a degraded type here; the people are very superstitious, worship demons, and have many serious vices.

The industries are primitive—weaving mats, baskets, and silk and cotton cloth, paper-making, pottery, some wood-carving and bazaaring, being the principal ones. The English plan to push the cart-road to the Salween River this year; we hope, before much longer, that it will be extended to us. The roads through city and valley are good. Had I gone to Bassein, my work would have been pleasant and no doubt comparatively easy.

Here, I am the only white woman within two hundred miles, and the work will be slow and difficult. But though there are many hard and annoying things, the blessings and privilege of beginning the work in this large, important field, far outweigh them. DELL YOUNG.

Keng Tung, Burmah, May 17

*Miss Della Mason, of DeGraaf, Ohio, the writer of this letter, is a young missionary who, since setting out for her new field, has become Mrs. W. H. Young. She met on the steamer the missionary to whom she was married on reaching India. They are now co-workers in the Burmah field.

WATERING THE SHEEP

TEXT -- Genesis 29: 8:

We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep.

A SCENE in Mesopotamia, beautifully pastoral. A well of water of great value in that region. The fields around about it white with three flocks of sheep lying down waiting for the watering. I hear their bleating coming on the bright air, and the laughter of young men and maidens indulging in rustic repartee. I look off, and I see other flocks of sheep coming. Meanwhile, Jacob, a stranger, on the interesting errand of looking for a wife, comes to the well. A beautiful shepherdess comes to the same well. I see her approaching, followed by her father's flock of sheep. It was a memorable meeting. Jacob married that shepherdess. The Bible account of it is: "Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept." It has always been a mystery to me what he found to cry about! But before that scene occurred, Jacob accosts the shepherds and asks them why they postpone the slaking of the thirst of these sheep, and why they did not immediately proceed to water them. The shepherds reply to the effect: "We are all good neighbors, and as a matter of courtesy we wait until all the sheep of the neighborhood come up. Besides that, this stone on the well's mouth is somewhat heavy, and several of us take hold of it and push it aside, and then the buckets and the troughs are filled, and the sheep are satisfied. Oh, this is a thirsty world! Hot for the head, and blistering for the feet, and parching for the tongue. The world's great want is a cool, refreshing, satisfying draught. We wander around, and we find the cistern empty. Long and tedious drought has dried up the world's fountain, but centuries ago, a shepherd, with crook in the shape of a cross, and feet cut to the bleeding, explored the desert passages of this world, and one day came across a well a thousand feet deep, bubbling and bright, and opalescent, and looked to the north, and the south, and the east, and the west, and cried out with a voice strong and musical, that rang through the ages: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!"

The Whole World Invited

Now a great flock of sheep to-day gather around this Gospel well. There are a great many thirsty souls. I wonder why the flocks of all nations do not gather—why so many stay thirsty; and while I am wondering about it, my text breaks forth in the explanation, saying: "We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep."

This well of the Gospel is deep enough to put out the burning thirst of the sixteen hundred million of the race. Do not let the Church, by a spirit of exclusiveness, keep the world out. Let down all the bars, swing open all the gates, scatter all the invitations: "Whosoever will, let him come." Come, white and black. Come, red men of the forest. Come, Laplander, out of the snow. Come, Patagonian, out of the heat. Come in furs. Come panting under palm leaves. Come one. Come all. Come now. As at this well of Mesopotamia, Jacob and Rachel were betrothed, so this morning, at this well of salvation, Christ, our Shepherd, will meet you coming up with your long flocks of cares and anxieties, and he will stretch out his hand in pledge of his affection, while all heaven will cry out: "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him."

You notice that this well of Mesopotamia had a stone on it, which must be removed before the sheep could be watered; and I find on the well of salvation to-day impediments and obstacles which must be removed, in order that you may obtain the refreshment and life of this Gospel. In your case, the impediment is pride of heart. You cannot bear to come to so democratic a fountain; you do not want to come with so many others. It is as though you were thirsty, and you were invited to slake your thirst at the town-pump, instead of sitting in a parlor sipping out of a chased chalice which has just been lifted from a silver salver. Not so many publicans and sinners. You want to get to heaven, but you must be in a special car, with your feet on a Turkish ottoman, and a band of music on board the train. You do not want to be in company with rustic Jacob and Rachel, and to be drinking out of the fountain where ten thousand sheep have been drinking before you. You will have to remove the obstacle of pride, or never find your way to the well. You will have to come as we came, willing to take the water of eternal life in any way, and at any hand, and in any kind of pitcher, crying out: "Oh, Lord Jesus, I am dying of thirst. Give me the water of eternal life, whether in trough or goblet; give me the water of life; I care not in what it comes to me." Away with all your hindrances of pride of heart, or of wealth, or culture, or station from the well's mouth.

Here is another man who is kept back from this water of life, by the stone of an obdurate heart, which lies over the mouth of the well. You have no more feeling upon this subject than if God had yet to do you the first kindness, or you had to do God the first wrong. Seated on his lap all these years, his everlasting arms sheltering you, where is your gratitude? Where is your morning and evening prayer? Where are your consecrated lives? I say to you, as Daniel said to Belshazzar: "The God in whose hand thy breath is, and all thy way, thou hast not glorified." If you treated anybody as badly as you have treated God, you would have made five hundred apologies—yea, your whole life would have been an apology. Three times a day you have been seated at God's table. Spring, summer, autumn and winter he has appropriately appareled you. Your health from him, your companion from him, your children from him, your home from him, all the bright surroundings of your life from him. O man, what dost thou with that hard heart?

Satisfaction for the Discontented

Jacob, with a good deal of tug and push, took the stone from the well's mouth, so that the flocks might be watered. And I would that this day my word, blessed of God, might remove the hindrances to your getting up to the Gospel well. Yea, I take it for granted that the work is done, and now, like Oriental shepherds, I proceed to water the sheep. Come, all ye thirsty! You have an undefined longing in your soul. You tried money-making; that did not satisfy you. You tried office under Government; that did not satisfy you. You tried pictures and sculptures; but works of art did not satisfy you.

There are men who are perfectly discontented. Unhappy in the past, unhappy to-day, to be unhappy forever, unless you come to this Gospel well. This satisfies the soul with a high, deep, all-absorbing, and eternal satisfaction. It comes, and it offers the most unfortunate man so much of this world as is best for him, and throws all heaven into the bargain.

Come, also, to this Gospel well, all ye troubled. I do not suppose you have escaped. Compare your view of this life at fifteen years of age with what your view is of it at forty or sixty or seventy. What a great contrast of opinion! Were you right then, or are you right now? Two cups placed in your hands, the one a sweet cup, the other a sour cup. A cup of joy and a cup of grief. Which has been the nearest to being full, and out of which have you the more frequently partaken? What a different place the cemetery is from what it used to be! Once it was to you a grand city improvement, and you went out on the pleasure excursion, and you ran laughingly up the mound, and you criticised in a light way the epitaph. But since the day when you heard the bell toll at the gate when you went in with the procession, it is a sad place, and there is a flood of rushing memories that suffuse the eye and overmaster the heart. Oh, you have had trouble, trouble, trouble. God only knows how much you have had. It is a wonder you have been able to live through it. It is a wonder your nervous system has not been shattered, and your brain has not reeled. Trouble, trouble!

Relief for the Troubled

If I could gather all the griefs, of all sorts, from these crowded streets, and could put them in one scroll, neither man nor angel could endure the recitation. Well, what do you want? Would you like to have your property back again? "No," you say, as a Christian man, "I was becoming arrogant, and I think that is why the Lord took it away. I don't want to have my property back." Well, would you have your departed friends back again? "No," you say, "I couldn't take the responsibility of bringing them from a tearless realm to a realm of tears. I couldn't do it." Well, then, what do you want? A thousand voices in the audience cry out: "Comfort. Give us comfort!" For that reason I have rolled away the stone from the well's mouth. Come, all ye wounded of the flock, pursued of the wolves, come to the fountain where the Lord's sick and bereft ones have come. "Ah," says some one, "you are not old enough to understand my sorrows. You have not been in the world as long as I have, and you can't talk to me about my misfortunes in the time of old age." Well, I may not have lived as long as you, but I have been a great deal among old people, and I know how they feel about their failing health and about their departed friends, and about the loneliness that sometimes strikes through their souls. After two persons have lived together for forty or fifty years, and one of them is taken away, what desolation! I shall not forget the cry of Dr. De Witt, of New York, when he stood by the open grave of his beloved wife, and, after the obsequies had ended, he looked down into the open place and said: "Farewell, my honored, faithful and beloved wife. The bond that bound us is severed. Thou art in glory, and I am here on earth. We shall meet again. Farewell!"

Forebodings Removed

You get a little worried for fear that some time come to want, do you? Your children and grandchildren sometimes speak a little sharp to you because of ailments. The Lord will not speak sharp. Think you will come to want? What do you think the Lord is? Are his granaries empty? Will he let the raven and the rabbit and the lion in the desert forget you? Why, naturalists tell us that the lion will not forsake its wounded and sick mate. You suppose the Lord of heaven and earth has much sympathy as the fish of the sea? But you are am so near worn out, and I am of no use to you more." I think the Lord knows whether you any more use or not; if you were of no more would have taken you before this. Do you think he has forgotten you because he has taken care of seventy or eighty years? He thinks more of you than he ever did, because you think more of him the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, a the aged, be your God forever. But I gather promises to-day in a group, and I ask the shepherd drive their flocks of lambs and sheep up to the supply. "Behold, happy is the man whom God hath." "Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion." "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." "Vengeance will I take of mine enemies, and I will be patient for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I am determined that no one shall go out of this world uncomfited. Yonder is a timid and shrinking soul who seems to hide away from the consolation uttering, as a child with a sore hand hides away from the physician, lest he touch the wound too roughly, the mother has to go and compel the little pauper to come out and see the physician. So I come to-day and shrink to-day, and compel you to come out in the presence of the Divine Physician. He will not hurt you. He has been healing wounds many years, and he will give you gentle and omnificent medicament.

But people, when they have trouble, go and rather than to God. De Quincy took opium to get rid of his troubles. Charles Lamb took to punch. Theodore Hook took to something stronger. Edwin Booth took to theatrical dissipation. And men have gone around the earth, hoping in the quick transit to get away from their misfortunes. It has been a delusion. There is only one well that can slake the thirst of an afflicted spirit, and that is the deep and inextinguishable well of the Gospel.

The Well of Celestial Rapture

But some one in the audience says: "Notwithstanding all you have said this morning, I find no alleviation in my troubles." Well, I am not through yet. I have left the most potent consideration for the last. I am going to soothe you with the thought of heaven. Every talkative we may be, there will come a time when the stoutest and most emphatic interrogation will evolve no answer. As soon as we have closed our eyes for the final silence, no power on earth can break that taciturnity. But where, O Christian, will be your home in a scene of infinite gladness. The spring morning of heaven waving its blossoms in the bright air, fresh from battle showing their scars. The earthly sorrow struck through with the rainbow of joy. In one group God, and angels, and deemed—Paul and Silas, Latimer and Ridley and Jeremiah, Payson and John Milton, Gabriel Michael, the archangel. Long line of choristers, singing across the hills. Seas of joy dashing to the beach. Conquerors marching from gate to gate among them. Oh, what a great flock God will gather around the celestial well. No stone on the well's mouth while the Shepherd waters the sheep. There will recognize Rachel, the shepherdess. And standing on one side of the well of eternal rapture, your children and standing on the other side of eternal rapture, your Christian ancestry; you will be bounded on all sides by a joy so keen and grand that no other world has been permitted to experience it. Out of that or well of heaven, the Shepherd will dip reunion for the bereaved, wealth for the poor, health for the sick, for the weary. And then all the flock of the sheep will lie down in the green pastures, and without end we will praise the Lord that on this Sabbath morning we were permitted to study the story of Jacob and Rachel at the well.

The Story of Her Sufferings by the Famine Excites Universal Sympathy --- Contributions to the Fund

SELDOM has any great public movement awakened a feeling of sympathy more genuine and widespread than that which has been evoked by our Famine Relief Work in China. In the their trade, from their own and neighboring nations. Under what an immense debt is America, and other Christian countries, to China for all the useful and beneficial articles of commerce, and the suggestions at least of so many sources of modern civilization and power. We ought, as nations, to begin to pay back something of what we owe. But we can give it blessings "an hundred fold" greater. We can give them knowledge, and healing for their suffering bodies, and life everlasting through our common divine Redeemer.

Mrs. Jos. Ballinger, Newcastle, Wash., writes: I am pleased to know that the amount raised by our little Sunday School will go through the hands of Rev. Arthur H. Smith, whom I was personally acquainted with when he was a mere boy, receiving his education then under his sainted father, who was pastor of the church I attended at Godfrey, Ill.

Miss Minnie Baer, representing the Young Ladies' Bible Class of La Crosse, Wis., sends $15, and $5 from Miss Katie Bassman, to help "save starving souls and hungry bodies."

Friends in Gloversville, N. Y., in forwarding their offering, write: "May the Lord bring light from the darkness as he surely will."

Mrs. W. M. C., Le Mars, Ia., ($5) writes: "I earnestly hope that your appeal, sent out in behalf of China's famishing millions, may meet with a generous response all over prosperous America."

"I send this in dear Jesus' name to China's sufferers, hoping it may save some poor soul. I only wish it were more," writes Mrs. W. T. W., Ankona, Fla.

"We are poor and have a large family," write W. D. L. and wife, of Avalon, Va., "yet we are blessed with food. May our little help the work."

We might quote from hundreds of other letters, in the same earnest, helpful tone, but these will suffice.

Illustrated Circulars

Containing full information regarding the great famine in China, are now ready, and will be forwarded in quantities free to any church, Sunday School, C. E., E. L., B. Y. P. U., or other society, or to individuals on demand. A postal addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, and asking for circulars (state number required), will receive immediate attention.

Famine Mite Boxes

for the use of Sunday School classes, church societies and similar organizations, will also be sent to any address, free, on receipt of postal at this office requesting the same. These are specially serviceable for use among the young people who may wish to be represented in this life-saving crusade in China.

All contributions to the Famine Relief Work will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Vacations

THE question for months in many of our households, was as to the best mode of vacation. We all need rest. The first thing to do is to measure the length of your purse; you cannot make a short purse reach around Saratoga and the White Mountains. There may be as much health, good cheer and recuperation in a country farm-house, where the cows come up every night and yield milk without any chalk in it. What the people of our cities need is quiet. What the people of the country need is sight-seeing. Let the mountains come to New York and New York go to the mountains. The nearest I ever get to heaven in this world is lying flat down on my back under a tree, looking up through the branches, five miles off from a post office or a telegraph station. But this would be torture to others. Independent of what others do or say, let us, in the selection of summer recreations, study our own temperament and finances. It does not pay to spend so much money in July and August, that you have to go pinched and half mad the rest of the year. The healthiest recreations do not cost much. In boyhood, with a string and a crooked pin attached to it, I fished up more fun from the mill-pond, than one summer, with a ten dollar apparatus, I caught among the Franconia Mountains. There is a great area of enjoyment within the circumference of one dollar, if you only know how to make the circuit. More depends upon ourselves than upon the affluence of our surroundings. If you are compelled to stay home all summer, you may be as happy as though you went away. The enjoyment of the first of July, when I go away, is surpassed by nothing but the first of September, when I come home.

He hath made everything beautiful in its time. Eccles. 3: 11.

Attractive Names

WHEN there are so many pleasant names by which children may be called, what right has a parent to place on his child's head a disadvantage at the start? Worse than the gauntlet of measles and whooping-cough and mumps, which the little ones have to run, is this parental outrage. What a struggle in life that child will have who has been baptized Jedekiah or Mehitabel! If a child is "called after" some one living, let that one be past mid-life and of such temperament that there shall be no danger of his becoming an absconder and a cheat. As far as possible let the name given be short, so that in the course of a lifetime there be not too many weeks or months taken up in the mere act of signature. The burdens of life are heavy enough without putting upon any one the extra weight of too much nomenclature. It is a sad thing when an infant has two bachelor uncles, both rich and with outrageous names, for the baby will have to take both titles, and that is enough to make a case of infant mortality.

They called him Zacharias, after the name of his father. And his mother answered, Not so; but he shall be called John. Luke 1: 60.

To the Gardens

THE merchants of Jerusalem had suburban residences. Christ had somehow become acquainted with one of these men, and been invited by him to come out to the country home. There were gardens surrounding the house. After the heat and excitement of the day in the city, it was pleasant to go out and sit and walk under the trees and among the flowers. Jesus is in the garden one night, and sees the gleam of torches and lanterns. Judas and an armed band are coming to take him captive. In this rough way ended the season of reflection and recreation. You find here, as elsewhere, that Jesus loved the country. We find him among the mountains and sitting by the sea. He pressed a lily in his sermon. He caught a bird for a text. He walked in the garden the night of his capture. So it is a good sign when a Christian finds company and suggestiveness and refreshment in the beautiful things of God's world. There may be means of grace in a hyacinth or japonica. It is well when, in the small doorway of a city residence, a patch of luxuriant grass is cultivated, or a clematis is taught to climb. A man can preach better of love and faith and heaven when there are camellias on the pulpit. It is no evidence of weak sentimentality when a Christian loves natural beauty. Jesus resorted to a garden. No doubt Christ selected the garden of this country-seat as a place for private devotion. He who has no spot for secret prayer is a starveling Christian. A man has sorrows, temptations, sins and deliverances that are no one else's business. He is a fool who tells the world everything. There are prayers that belong only to God's ear. Better have some place consecrated to private prayer. Choose a pleasant place if possible—not the garret, not the cellar, but a room warm, lighted, cheerful. There is no use in penance. When you invite Jesus to meet you, open for him the most cheerful and pleasant place you can find. Jesus resorted to a garden.

Household Cares

NON-APPRECIATION is what made Martha so vexed with Mary. As now, men bothered with the anxieties of the store, and office, and shop, or coming from the stock exchange, they say when they get home: "Oh, you ought to be in our factory a little while; you ought to have to manage eight, or ten, or twenty subordinates, and then you would know what trouble and anxiety are!" Oh, sir! the wife and mother has to conduct at the same time a university, a clothing establishment, a restaurant, a laundry, a library, while she is health officer, police, and president of her realm. She must do a thousand things, and do them well, in order to keep things going smoothly; and so her brain and her nerves are taxed to the utmost. We know there are housekeepers who are so fortunate that they can sit in an armchair in the library, or lie on the belated pillow, and throw off all the care upon subordinates, who, having large wages and great experience, can attend to all the affairs of the household. Those are the exceptions. We speak of the great mass of housekeepers—the women to whom life is a struggle, and who at thirty years of age look as though they were forty, and at forty look as though they were fifty, and at fifty look as though they were sixty. The fallen at Chalons, and Austerlitz, and Gettysburg, and Waterloo are a small number compared with the slain in the great Armageddon of the kitchen. You go out to the cemetery and you will see that the tombstones all read beautifully poetic; but if those tombstones would speak the truth, thousands of them would say: "Here lies a woman killed by too much mending, and sewing, and baking, and scrubbing, and scouring; the weapon with which she was slain was a broom, or a sewing machine, or a ladle."

You think, man of the world, that you have all the cares and anxieties. If the cares and anxieties of the household should come upon you for one week you would be a fit candidate for the insane asylum. The half-rested housekeeper arises in the morning. She must have the morning repast prepared at an irrevocable hour. What if the fire will not light? what if the marketing did not come? what if the clock has stopped? No matter; she must have the morning repast at an irrevocable hour. Then the children must be got off to school. What if their garments are torn? What if they do not know their lessons? What if they have lost a hat or sash? They must be ready. Then you have all the diet of the day, and perhaps of several days, to plan. But what if the butcher has sent meat unmarketable, or the grocer has sent articles of food adulterated? and what if some piece of silver be gone, or some favorite chalice be cracked, or the roof leak, or the plumbing fail, or any one of a thousand things occur? You must be ready. Spring weather comes and there must be a revolution in the family wardrobe; or autumn comes, and you must shut out the northern blast. But what if the moth has preceded you to the chest? what if, during the year, the children have outgrown the apparel of last year? what if the fashions have changed? Your house must be an apothecary's shop; it must be a dispensary; there must be medicines for all sorts of ailments—something to loosen the croup, something to cool the burn, something to poultice the inflammation, something to silence the jumping tooth. If, under all this wear and tear of life, your "better half" takes an impatient rush upon the library or drawing-room, patient, be lenient. O woman, though we may stir up an appreciation in the souls of others in the to your household toils, let us assure you, from the indolence with which Jesus Christ met Martha, that appreciates all your work from garret to cellar; and that the God of Deborah, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Grandmother Lois, and Elizabeth Fry, and Hannah More, is the God of the housekeeper. Jesus was ever married, that he might be the especial friend and confidant of a whole world of troubled womanhood.

A woman that feareth the Lord shall be praised. Of her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her. Prov. 31: 30.

Good Company

LET no young man or woman go in a social circle where the influences are vicious or hostile to the Christian religion. You will begin by reproving their faults, and end by copying them. Sin is contagious. You go among those who are profane, and you will be profane. You go among those who use impure language, and you will use impure language. Go among those who are given to strong drink, and you will inevitably become an inebriate. There is no exception to this. A man is no better than the company he continually keeps. It is always best to keep ourselves under Christian influences. It is not possible if you mingle in associations that are positively Christian, not to be made better men or women. The Christian people with whom you associate may not be always talking their religion, but there is something in the moral atmosphere that will be life to your soul. You choose out for yourselves intimate associates eight or ten Christian people. You mingle in that association; you take their counsel; you are guided by their example, and you live a useful life, and die a happy death, and go to a blessed eternity. There is no possibility of mistaking it; there is no exception in all the universe or ages—not one.

Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Prov. 4: 14.

Opposed to Everything

A FRIEND called our attention to the fact that an ballat wanted to hold consultation with Nehemiah in the plain of O-no. That is the place where more people stay to-day than in any other. They are always protesting, throwing doubt on grand undertakings; and while you are in the mountain of O-yes, they end their time on the plain of O-no. In the harness of society they are breeching-straps, good for nothing but to hold back. You propose to call a minister. At the indications are that he is the right man. Nine-tenths of the congregation are united in his favor. The matter is put to vote. The vast majority say "Aye!" the handful of opponents respond "O no!" You propose to build a new church. About the site, the choice of architects, the upholstery, the plumbing, and the cost of dedication, there is almost a unanimity. You hope that the crooked sticks will all lie still, and that the congregation will move in solid phalanx. But not so. An ballat sends for Nehemiah, proposing to meet him on the plain of O-no. Some men were born backward, and have been going that way ever since. Opposition to everything has become chronic. The only way they feel comfortable is when harnessed with the face toward the whiffle-tree, and their back to the end of the shafts. They may set down their name in the hotel register as living in Boston, Chicago, Savannah or Washington, but they really have been spending all their lives on the plain of O-no. There let them be buried, with their face toward the west, for in that way they will lie more comfortable, as other people are buried with their face to the east. Do not impose upon them by putting them in the majority. O no!

The prayers of the readers of this journal are required for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Consumption Curable

PHYSICIANS the world over are deeply interested in the theories advanced at the recent Congress on Tuberculosis in London, by Professor Koch, the famous German authority on consumption. Prof. Koch's discovery of the consumption bacillus, and the method of treating it, give him a prestige which was recognized by the eminent physicians from all parts of the world who were assembled at this Congress. In an able paper, which was listened to with great attention, the great specialist propounded theories which caused general surprise. He contended that heredity had little, if anything, to do with the spread of consumption. Also, that contrary to the general opinion it could not ever be transmitted through milk, beer or meat. He held that consumption in the cow was an altogether separate and distinct disease from consumption in human beings, and he cited evidence from his own experiments in proof of the fact. He believes that the disease is spread by the expectoration of consumptive sufferers, and that the surest way of checking the spread of the disease is by secluding the patient, and systematically disinfecting the rooms occupied by sufferers. He highly praised the legislation in New York which makes it a punishable offence to expectorate in the street, and expressed his belief that the law will result in a marked diminution in the number of sufferers from consumption. He spoke most hopefully, too, of therapeutic measures now being adopted, and reported many cures from his own practice. No news could be more welcome than this to many a hopeless sufferer, for it holds out to him the possibility of life and health. Would that the far greater number who suffer from the misery of sin were as eager for the cure which Christ offers and which never fails.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered (Jer. 8: 22).

Wife at Home

A press despatch from Kansas City, Mo. reports that one of the fortunate applicants for a home in the new Indian colony was formerly a resident of that city. In one of the large department stores was a clerk, who out of her scanty earnings supported an invalid mother. She worked hard, but with the utmost economy it was often difficult to buy the clothing and shoes that the clerk is expected to wear. Rent and food, and an occasional decay for the mother absorbed the small sum that was paid her at the end of the week. There seemed no prospect of any improvement in her condition, and she had become engaged to a young man whose situation was little better than her own. About six months ago she succeeded in obtaining employment as a telephone operator at Wichita, Kans., where she was born, and where some friends of her family used their influence to get her the appointment. Her salary was nine dollars a week, and this was comparative wealth to her. When the news came that the Indian country was to be allotted, the girl registered her claim at El Reno. The very first day drawing of a thousand homesteads brought out her name. It is said that her holding, at a very conservative estimate, is worth twenty thousand dollars. The Kansas City young man has been summoned, and she is to be a wedding before the girl goes out to take possession of her property. There are many who will envy the girl her good fortune, but how few there are who while they would rejoice in such a prize, would accept the offer that God makes to them of an infinitely more desirable possession through Christ.

It is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for us a city (Heb. 11: 16).

Chief in Base Metal

A poisonous engagement ring was presented by a lover to the lady of his choice. The lover, on receiving the lady's consent to his offer of marriage, purchased a ring which he placed on her finger. There was a slight abrasion of the skin, which became painful after the ring had been worn a few days; then the finger began to swell, and soon the whole arm was swollen and discolored. Physicians were summoned, who, after an examination, declared that the lady was suffering from blood poisoning, produced by base metal in the engagement ring. Under their treatment the lady recovered. The lover stated that the jeweler from whom he bought the ring assured him it was pure gold; but when it was tested after the mischief was done, it was found to have little if any gold in it. Lovers who hear of this incident, and who are about to give such a present, will doubtless take warning by it and see that the ring is of pure gold. If they will also take warning by other incidents, which the records of our divorce courts furnish, and earnestly seek that wisdom which pure gold typifies, they and their future wives may be spared much suffering.

My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold (Prov. 8: 19).

Treasured Letters

Three treasured letters, framed and glazed, ornament the wall of a humble home in Lewiston, Me. They were written by the grandfather of the present owner, him on the complaint of his aunt. The woman said that her brother, the boy's father, was dead. He died all alone in a wretched tenement in Harlem, and she had not heard that he was ill, until the news of his death reached her. Then she hunted up the young man and asked him if he knew his father was dead. He replied that he did, but he did not care. Some years ago his father had caused him to lose a situation, and he would never forgive him. He would not go to see his body, nor would he pay the expenses of his funeral. The aunt, though a poor woman, said that she would pay the undertaker, but she found that the young man held the deed of the lot belonging to his father in Calvary Cemetery, and would not give it up. He considered Potter's Field a good enough place for his father to be buried in. She wanted the judge to issue an order, compelling the young man to give up the deed of the lot. The judge willingly complied, and at the same time told the young man he was the meanest defendant he had ever had before him. So the son gave up the deed, and his father will be decently interred in the cemetery at his sister's expense. Most people will agree with the judge as to the character of the son, but how many there are who show similar undutifulness towards their heavenly Father, to whom they are under infinitely greater obligation:

The Lord hath spoken: I have nourished and brought up children and they have rebelled against me (Isa. 1: 2).

BRIEF NOTES

Dr. Montgomery, the Bishop of Tasmania, has been chosen as a successor to Prebendary Tucker in the secretaryship of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

President McKinley has appointed Dr. C. P. H. Nason, the pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Germantown, Penn., to be United States Consul at Grenoble, France.

Dr. J. Milton Greene, whose work in Mexico and Porto Rico has been greatly blessed, is holding services in Spanish for the benefit of Spanish speaking visitors at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, N. Y.

The Federal Defence Bill just passed by the Australian Parliament provides, with certain exceptions, that all males in Australia between the ages of 18 and 60 shall be liable to serve as volunteers in times of emergency.

A statement of Presbyterian statistics, just issued, shows that there are now in the United States 7,532 ministers; 7,779 churches; 1,025,388 members and 1,058,110 Sunday School pupils. All these items show an increase on the figures of last year.

At the Baptist Young People's Convention in Chicago, 3,700 delegates and visitors were registered. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, John H. Mr. W. E. Lambden, of Brooklyn, writes that a remarkable work of grace has been witnessed at Milford, Del. Many sinners, he says, have been won for Christ and many backsliders reclaimed. Mr. Lambden suggests to Christians from the cities, who are staying in country places, that they hold meetings in open squares or in any suitable place, for, as a rule, the people are willing to hear.

Mr. W. S. Weeden writes that the tent meetings at Warren, Pa., have been very successful. Although the tent holds twelve hundred persons, large numbers have been unable to obtain admission and many have made a profession of Christ at the services. Mr. Weeden has now gone to Winona Lake, Ind., to assist Dr. Chapman in his Bible Conference. In Binghamton, N. Y., union services will be held in September, in which Mr. Weeden will take part.

A joint convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for the United States and Canada was held recently at Detroit, Mich. The council report showed that the brotherhood includes 1,676 chapters, and of the 607 chapters which had reported a showing of 6,790 members was made, with 367 probationers, and in the junior department 2,730 boys.

A saloon with the sign of "The Fox," at Munden, near Watford, England, which is said to have been the worst of its kind in the neighborhood, has been bought and "reformed" by the Hon. A. Holland-Hibbert, Sir Wilfrid Lawson's son-in-law, who has turned it into a coffee tavern, and renamed it "The Fox with his Teeth Drawn."

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions is seeking active consecrated men for mission work in the West, chiefly in New Mexico and Arizona. Men who are not afraid of hard work and not careful of their own comfort would find this an excellent opportunity of laboring in the cause of Christ. Applications should be sent to Dr. Charles L. Thompson, 156 Fifth Avenue.

The Sultan of Turkey, having paid the indemnity demanded for the outrages on the missions in Armenia, is now moving with the object of breaking down their work. A despatch from Constantinople says: "Following the graduation of the first Turkish girl at the American Girls' College, the Turkish Government has issued an edict prohibiting Turkish children from attending foreign schools and the employment of Christian teachers in Turkish households."

Rev. John McNeill has been assisting in the tent work in Philadelphia, Pa. He has delivered ten addresses a week, going from tent to tent. At his farewell meeting there were great crowds of people eagerly desiring to meet the famous Scotch Evangelist and to listen to his stirring words. All persons who were members of churches were requested to leave the tent that Mr. McNeill might give a concluding address to the unconverted. It is believed that many gave themselves to Christ that night.

who at the time of writing was fighting for his country against the British. The first letter, which is a specimen of the others, is dated "Cambridge, June 18, 1775," the day after the Bunker Hill fight. The writer, one Jeremiah Dole, thus addresses his wife and child: "I right these few lines to let you know that I am well as I expected to be. Through good Providence God saved my life. But we expect to go at it a gin to-day very hot. I puts my trust in God. I hope to see you again. Don't send my things Before you here from me again. No more at present. I hant time to write no more." It will be seen that the letters are not prized for their accurate orthography nor for their literary merit, but because the owner is proud of an ancestor who risked his life for his country's deliverance. Such relics would be treasured in any patriotic family, and even by men who hold in light esteem the words of him who gave his life not for one country alone, but for a lost world.

Whosoever believeth in him shall not perish; but have everlasting life (John 3: 16).

WO world-wide movements among the Jews of to-day, are the "Jewish Colonization Association," and "Zionism." Though in perfect sympathy with each other's aims and labors, they are practically two distinctly separate movements. To these might be added, as a third, the "Alliance Israelite Universelle," which occupies itself chiefly with the education of the rising generation of Jews throughout the world, by providing schools and other institutions of learning. The aims and activities of Zionism, the American leader of which is Prof. Richard Gottheil, of New York, have already found presentation in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose readers understand that the Zionists are seeking to secure, through guarantees from the Porte and the Christian powers, political and industrial security for Jewish colonies in Palestine; these obtained, they purpose to inaugurate more extensive Hebrew settlements in the Holy Land than any that have yet been planted.

The Jewish Colonization Association was founded with the object of mitigating the evils caused by restrictions laid upon Hebrews in Russia and elsewhere, and to relieve congested districts where people of this race were congregated by law or otherwise. In order to accomplish this, it was necessary to find homes for Jews in countries not overcrowded. Naturally, Palestine, the land associated with their early history, was the country upon which attention fixed itself.

About two thousand Jewish families form the twenty-two colonies now settled in different parts of Palestine. It is not the aim of the Jewish Colonization Society to make a farmer of every Israelite—such an idea would be Utopian. To be prosperous and independent, a community needs mechanics, traders, bankers, brokers, physicians and lawyers, as well as farmers, and the Association aims to encourage at once professional and pastoral pursuits. In the scheme, a tract of land is purchased, which, in accord with the custom of the country, is divided into two parts, the one to form the village, where the colonists dwell, and the other for tillage. The houses of the village are built of stone, which is plentiful in Palestine. If there is no natural spring of water on the land, large cisterns are constructed to catch the rain water which falls during the wet season.

In some instances, wells have been dug with satisfactory results. The land for agriculture is planted in grape vines, olive trees, grain, fruits, and vegetables. Silk-worms and bees are raised. The honey made is of an exceptionally fine flavor. Any Hebrew can join the colony by renting a piece of the land, or a house, or both. If he lacks the money to do this, he can hire himself out as a laborer. No other qualification or preparation is needed than the desire and ability to work. In time, the thrifty and industrious laborer is entitled to rent or purchase house and land from the Association.

The Association provides practical instruction in agriculture, for Jews who have followed other trades but who wish to become farmers. The mistake is not made of importing foreigners for teachers; native Arabs, who understand best the soil, climate, paying products, etc., of the country, are employed. Practical instruction in stone-cutting, building, and other useful trades is also provided. The Association has one hundred and ten schools for children, including institutions in the cities. Instruction is carried on in Hebrew, which language the Association aims to make the language of the people. Arabic is taught as the vernacular of the country, Turkish as the official language, French as the commercial tongue of the Mediterranean ports; and German because so much Jewish literature exists in that tongue. Where funds are low, only Hebrew and Arabic are taught. Colonists and children who can afford to do so, are expected to pay for instruction; but such as have not the means receive it free of charge. It is not necessary for a colonist to be a Zionist, but the young people are encouraged to sympathize with that movement. The Bedouins and Fellaheens in the vicinity of the settlements live on the most amicable and neighborly terms with their Jewish neighbors.

The Alliance Israelite Universelle first took the plan of Jewish colonization into practical consideration in 1869, by opening schools for boys and girls in Jerusalem and other cities of Palestine. Necessarily the beginnings were very small. In 1878, the Alliance first purchased land. In the Ottoman Empire, no alien can hold title deeds to real estate in his own name; he can only hold in lease or mortgage from a Turkish subject. The Sultan obviated this difficulty by granting the Baron de Rothschild, though an alien, a special permit to purchase real estate and hold title in his own name during his natural life, for colonization by Jews. The Baron can lease and rent houses and farms to actual settlers. He can also sell, but the purchaser will not receive legal title deeds from the government to the same unless he becomes a subject of the Sultan. The colonies are, at the present day, principally under the protective management of Baron Edmond de Rothschild. The late Baron de Hirsch was in sympathy with this movement and made generous contributions to it. The colonization scheme does not confine itself to making agricultural settlements in Palestine. Jews who have the necessary qualifications—principally Polish and Algerian Jews—of being familiar with the language and usages of the country, and who practise some useful handicraft, are encouraged and assisted to set up in the native villages, or among the tent-dwelling clearing Bedouins. These settlers, when reliable, are intrusted with funds to be invested in mortgages on lands, in cattle, grain, etc. Some of this class travel the country, and purchase cattle and all kinds of produce for the markets of the cities and for export to the Young men educated at the colony schools, are furnished with the means for following a professional career, or entering the civil service, whenever they are found possessed of special talent for such vocation.

There are several independent colonies. One of these, Mnuha Wnah'lah, was founded in 1890, by Russian and Polish Jews, principally from Warsaw, who have already built a comfortable village, dug wells, cultivated vineyards, planted olive groves, and tilled grain lands. They have a school for children and two literary societies for adults. The genial, enterprising administrator of this settlement, Mr. Lewin Eppstein, is at present on a visit to this country. Another independent but struggling colony is composed of Arabian Jews, who for unknown centuries lived as Bedouins, near Mecca in Arabia. About thirty years ago, when the land had for several successive years been devastated by locusts and drought, these people moved, and occupied land lying between Jerusalem and the Jordan Valley.

Mr. Nissim Behar, of Jerusalem, President of the Jewish Colonization Association in Palestine, where he is popular and respected among Christians and Moslems as well as among his co-religionists, has just concluded a visit to this country, whither he came to propagate the principle of colonization for Jews in land not yet over populated.

Mr. Behar is so Superintendent of schools of the Alliance Israelite Universelle of Jerusalem, and is commissioned to establish branches of the Alliance in America.

When the Young Folk Marry

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S recent symposium on marriage profoundly interested me, and I read with mingled wonder and pleasure the opinions of great men, ministers and others, on this subject of extreme importance. "But you must begin in the beginning," says a very welcome correspondent. "When boys and girls have been allowed to run wild as children, 'tis useless for parents to sit and decide the kind of husband they would choose for a daughter, or the daughter-in-law they would prefer a son to bring to them. 'Water seeks its level,' and unless mothers early seek the child's interest, later in life they will surely disappoint parental hopes. The mother's responsibilities never relax; first seen in her daily life—her example—then in her training, she must be ever ready to meet the demands of the varying dispositions which God has set to her for guidance.

Mothers must know that the first sixteen years are moulding character—the next ten mould the disposition. If the child's character is well established, and the mother has taught him or her unselfishness, honesty, generosity and fidelity, then let there be no fear. The test must be made each for the individual self. The first two or three years of marriage may be trying, but the true heart and the right conduct will win the day. Let the mother beware of interference or advice. One thing more. Mr. Moody has well expressed it: "Let there be love between them;" without which this world is a howling wilderness, with which they will melt and overcome all obstacles. Let each mother teach her sons and daughters that delicate consideration which appreciates the fact that they have equal rights—neither wants to "boss"—but, unless their natures are congenial, they fail to see all the beautiful possibilities in the life about them.

When your children join church early or late, do not fold your hands and murmur: "I thank the Lord my dangs are safe." The young converts need care and watching. Do not try to keep your children from pleasures which young people crave; go into the world with them, teach them how to take it aright—no mother is all sufficient for her children—they crave youth. Train your sons and daughters to low purity, honesty and refinement; give them the best education possible, and then let them choose their own wives and husbands; then be ever ready to assist, but never to interfere.

In the Brook

Other and aunty like to spend the happy summer evenings by the brookside, and Rover is never contented to be left at home. Baby Gerald must be of the party too, and when the thermometer mounts high, and the little fellow looks flushed and hot, the wise mother takes off the encumbering outer garments, slips on a furry little bathing-suit, and lets him have the delight of dip in the crystal waves. Aunty kilts up her skirts, takes off her shoes and stockings, and wades into the cool water, where she and her small nephew have a regular frolic. Baby is early becoming familiar with the brook, and when a little older he will learn to swim, thus gaining, as everybody ought, real independence in the watery element. A landscape without a brook or a pool is shorn of one very picturesque feature, and lacks something of buoyant life.

Life Helpers

Even if the little helpers in the household are not much better than little hinderers, it is well to encourage the efforts. Children may learn to save steps for the mothers, and at the same time may gain good lessons for themselves, by always putting away their outer garments when they come in, as they can easily do, if there are pegs and hooks driven where they can be reached by a childish hand. Boys, as well as girls, should be permitted to wash the dishes, learning to do the work well, and thus preparing to make considerate husbands in days to come. Every boy is the better for having chores to do, some little work around the house and garden, something which will lighten his mother's load. Little girls may not do what they attempt so well as they will when they are older, but they are learning by degrees, and the home school is a very pleasant one. So at least thinks COUSIN SUSIE.

A Suggestive Change

Mr. Robert Speer has recently mentioned that India, most conservative of lands, is being transformed, through the introduction of looms and spindles, and is manufacturing her own cotton. The finer grades of cotton cloth are not yet made in India, but she makes and sells large quantities of coarser cotton goods, which are used in Zanzibar, Mozambique, Aden and Africa. This new trade interest is doing much to break down the iron barriers of caste, and to provide places where native Christians can find remunerative occupation. Slowly as the East moves, it is moving with no retrograde steps, in the line of advancement which follows the Christian's prayer to Jesus, "Thy kingdom come!"

The Daily Parting

Not long ago, in New York, a motorman on his way to his work, waved his hand to his wife and babies, who were watching him from their window, and in the very act, was struck by a car and instantly killed. The man had been a hero, a year ago saving a child's life at the peril of his own, when the little thing strayed in front of his car. Husbands and wives separate every day, for the hours of the day's work, not always with kind words and looks. Sometimes domestic jars have left both miserable for the whole day. Usually, however, the leave-taking is pleasant, and the man goes forth to meet whatever may come, with the wife's kiss on his lips.

Family rows are generally started by trifles, and family friction should be avoided. One day the long parting must come. Let the brief partings and meetings be tender, and always so loving, that if any one of them should chance to be for life and death there would be no remorseful memory.

Useless Regrets

AMONG the saddest experiences of humanity, and the commonest, is that aftermath of sorrow which crops up in the waste places of life after dear ones are taken away. "If I had not been so blind," the mourner cries, "I would have seen the symptoms of the fatal disease and called in aid earlier." "If I had only forbidden John to go on that dangerous excursion; he would have listened to me and been spared." "If I had but warned Matilda of the danger she incurred in wearing herself out; but I was silent, I was cowardly, I feared to give offence." So we run the gamut of useless regrets, growing morbid and breaking our hearts with self-accusation, forgetting that, according to the light we had, we did and said what seemed to us requisite and necessary at the time.

In another phase we distress ourselves, and here with greater reason, because in the daily intercourse of the family we have failed to show lovingkindness; we have been impatient, we have wounded sensitive souls by undue reproof, or we have arrogantly insisted on our own way instead of yielding in sweet gentleness. Herein is sin, and sin to be repented of—carried to the Lord's feet and confessed. He who knoweth our infirmities is very gracious, and will forgive our shortcomings and our transgressions. Accepting his forgiveness, let us sin no more: let us behave with exceeding carefulness, curbing our tempers and restraining our speech; let us not be "froward" in home life. The old word is very expressive; but, dear friends, grief over the past makes no atonement. The present only is our own, and the future will be what the present shall decide. Away with the folly of vain regrets, and let us be up and doing now.

In one of Tennyson's idylls, the story of Gareth and Synette, the knight, supposed by the lady to be a scullion, is treated with the utmost scorn, and indignities are heaped upon him by a shrewish tongue; but he bears himself with an unfaltering courtesy through the ordeal, and at the last it is Synette, not Prince Gareth, who has anything for which to be sorry.

We are very apt to lament our business errors, our blunders which have kept us poor, while others have prospered. This thing we might have done and did not, this venture which turned out badly, this unwise caution, are so deplored that we lose courage and strength for the labor of the day that is ours; we let success elude us in our self-pity, and our weak moaning over failure. It is a good thing never to know when one is beaten, and to ignore the past, and to go on. A good deal of force, which might be utilized and put to good account, goes for nothing while we fret over errors. Sitting in the ashes is poor economy. There is great wisdom in the familiar stanza,

Oh, watch and fight and pray,
The battle ne'er give o'er;
Renew it boldly every day
And help Divine implore.

Help Divine implore! If we call upon Him, whatever the extremity, he will answer. Then, though Satan himself attack us, we may say, "Rejoice not over me, mine enemy; though I fall, I shall arise again!" And be the need ever so urgent, the sorrow ever so deep, the loss ever so irreparable, there are joy and comfort unspeakable for those who believe and obey, and who go trustingly every day to the Friend whose mercies and resources never fail.

ABRAHAM and ISAAC

 INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUGUST. 25. GEN. 22: 1-14
 GOLDEN TEXT -- BY FAITH ABRAHAM, WHEN HE WAS TRIED, OFFERED UP ISAAC. HEB. 11: 17

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

CASK a mixed crowd of Jews, Mahomedans, and Christians, "Who was the wisest man and what his wisest act?" and they will answer in chorus, for a majority of the race, "Solomon," and cite the story of the two mothers, both claiming the same babe. Solomon, sitting as a judge, tested them swiftly by ordering the child cut in twain and divided between them, an order which the pretender heard without protest, while the true mother, falling on her knees in agony, pleaded that the child might be given to the false mother rather than killed; upon which the judge, assured this was the rightful mother, gave her the child. He probably used the sword on the other, who had kidnapped the child. No one charges Solomon with cruelty for ordering the child slain, knowing he had no intention to cause his death, but only to find for him his true mother.

Why then should anyone find cruelty rather than wisdom in the precisely similar test of Abraham, when the King of kings, to prove and discipline and develop his faith, commanded him to sacrifice his son, never intending that Isaac should be slain, but only that Abraham's magnificent, all-conquering faith should be shown to the world as an example and inspiration, and that the divine love of the heavenly Father, which at the cross spared not his own Son, but freely sacrificed him for us all, might also be pictured in an acted parable and prophecy and promise.

The command to sacrifice Isaac was a startling one, but hardly less so was the command of Solomon to cut the babe in twain. And in both cases we need to put ourselves back into that age, when a king had power of life and death over every subject, and a father equal power over his son even into his early manhood. We should also remember that acted parables, teaching not alone by objects, but by things done, has always been a favorite method of instruction in Oriental countries.

In the Old Testament men were taught the Gospel not alone by spoken prophecies and by symbols, but also by such acted parables as the uplifted serpent, the smitten rock and the sacrifice of Isaac, all pointing to the cross. Those who say Abraham was in this act only copying the human sacrifices of the Canaanites, forget that he had shown no tendency to copy their worship. This was only the severer test of his faith in that God seemed to be leading him to such an imitation.

Where is Abraham living at the time of this lesson? In Beersheba, the southernmost town of Palestine. The lesson takes him to Mount Moriah, in what was afterwards a part of Jerusalem, the site of the altar in the temple.

Who went with him? Besides servants, only Isaac, the Child of Promise.

When was this? About 1871 B.C.—twenty-six years after the last lesson. Isaac was now about twenty-five years of age, but yet a minor, as a boy in those times was not of age till he was thirty.

What are the successive acts of the lesson? 1. To test Abraham's faith and love, God awoke him one night and commanded him to prove his entire consecration and complete faith and loyal obedience by taking Isaac to Mount Moriah and offering him as a burnt-offering, vv. 1, 2. (Remember the blood covenant, Gen. 15: 9-18, and what we said of its meaning.) 2. He "rose early" for prompt compliance, and "went unto the place of which God had told him" (v. 3). 3. He persisted in his purpose through the long journey of three days (v. 4). 4. At the foot of the mountain he left all but Isaac, lest some servant might interfere with his unusual sacrifice, or that he might be alone with God in that supreme "Consecration Service" (v. 5). 5. Upon Isaac, Abraham bound the wood, and, taking the fire and the knife, still loyal in this deepening darkness of his trial, climbed the mountain, not flinching even when his loved son said: "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" The question cut the father's heart like a knife, but he answered trustfully, "God will provide," believing that by resurrection (Heb. 11: 17f.), if not by substitution, he should come back with his living son at his side, and because he knew that God's command and God's promise can never conflict, though they seem to be rushing upon each other in deadly conflict. 6. At last, when they had built an altar of stone and piled on it the wood, Isaac had to be told that he was himself to be sacrificed. A young man of twenty-five surely could not have been bound and slain by an old man of 125 without his own consent, and so the untold story of his trustful submission at once to his earthly parent and his heavenly Father must here be read into the thrilling story. 7. The supreme moment came when Abraham raised the knife to slay his son. Not till then did God interpose. Faith and hope and love having borne the test, God provided a ram to die as Isaac's substitute.

What doctrines and duties are brought to us in this lesson?

- Obedience and sacrifice, the proofs of love.
- In the child.
- In the father.
- In the heavenly Father. (Other lessons are: The blessings of trial; the tests of character; obedience, the proof of consecration.)

Isaac's noble manhood we are to study in the next lesson. He was a good citizen then, because he had previously been a good child in the period we are now studying. His home life was in three words—love, trust and obey. Those words, as soon as he was able to know God, became the tie between him and his heavenly Father also. A boy who obeys his father and his God, will start life with such a habit of obedience that he is very unlikely to need the prison school of the disobedient. Said a jail warden: "Obedience is the first lesson we have to teach here. They would not be here, if they had learned that lesson at home." Isaac is a beautiful example of unquestioning obedience to a command of his father and of God that seemed strange and hard. He proved his love to both, his trust in both, by obedience and sacrifice, and came out better than all his fears. Nothing in architecture, or furniture, or food can do so much to make a happy home as absolute trust of parents in their children and of children in their parents, a trust that can be developed only by mutual of life. "Is my name written there?" I do not have to be great, but only to be good, and all of us, by God's help, be that, to win a place in that heavenly roll of honor.

A Youth who Obeyed his Father and his God

Abraham's obedience and sacrifice were far greater yet, to teach us to obey God, though the command seems unreasonable, and compliance impossible.

Manhood's Obedience and Sacrifice

Climb the steep, though death your greatest hopes seems to y at the summit, saying to y fears, "The Lord will provide." Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull has written the following profound words on God as provider, which means the same as God's Providence: "To provide is, in its root meaning, to foresee. Provide is our unlimited and infallible foreseer. The actions of man who can see farthest ahead are not likely to be fin understood by the man whose range of vision is shorter. finitely less likely, and equally unimportant, is it that n should understand each new turn of events in the Div plan. It is not necessary that we should understand compounding of a physician's prescription in order to get its benefit; much less necessary that we should know the reason for God's providences in order to get spiritual benefit which may be found them just by its seeking. Yet how common it is to hear a professing Christian who has been overwhelmed with sudden sorrow, say, "I cannot understand why this should have been sent to me." if he rebels against the chastening hand because he cannot see any reason for such providence, let him also remember that, if he cannot understand his adversity, not less can he understand his prosperity. . . . God is always providing, and he is quite as much our provider when he sends us want, and sends us sorrow when he sends us plenty, and sends us joy. We must accept the sorrow, since we refuse the good gift that lies in the sorrow?"

Not Moses only, but all great souls have endured and achieved "as seeing him who is invisible." For example, Busch quotes the following utterance of Bismarck: "I cannot conceive how a man can live without a belief in a revelation in a God who orders all things for the best, in a Supreme Judge from whom there is no appeal." Gladstone, in whose such a faith was yet more dominant, once said that of all the great leaders he knew in fifty years, only three or four had lacked such a belief in a King of kings.

This was but the greatest of five special sacrifices Abraham was called to make: 1. Of his country and kindred (Gen. 12: 1-9). 2. Of the first choice of his flock (13: 7-12). 3. Of the rich of Sodom (14: 24). 4. Of the child of promise (21: 7-14). 5. Of the child of promise (22: 1-13). The sacrificial altars of the Old Testament are done away, every noble life, no less than Abraham's, has its milestones of spiritual sacrifice all the way. And this way of sacrifice is the only way to noble character here on earth and in heaven hereafter. It seems to be God's law from the lowest forms of life, that way upward shall be through "the struggle for life" and the nobler "struggle for the life of others." The very moth struggles from the lower worm life of cocoon into the higher and more beautiful winged life to which God calls. It is only in human life that there is liberty to obey or disregard God's call to struggle and sacrifice. The rich young ruler, called to give up what was dear—his gold—did not bear the test. If he had, he would have gone away joyful that victory over self, which is greater than taking a city, instead of going away sorrowful in defeat and self-condemnation.

There can be no reasonable doubt that this acted parable of the sacrifice of Isaac was intended to instruct us.

God Spared not His Own Son alone to test Abraham's faith, but to instruct us and to picture also the sacrifice God would make of his own Son on those same hills, a later time. At the supreme moment of agony God spared Abraham's son, but when his own Son exclaimed in Gethsemane's shadow of the cross, "If it be possible, let this pass from me," God spared not his own Son, but gave him to death for us all.

Here is a story in which human and Divine sacrifice combined. A mother had given up her boy to fight Cuba. As the regiment was speeding southward, so Christian gave him a Testament at a railway station. He had taken a "treat" of beer or whiskey from some less than friend of the soldiers at the previous station, and was feeling very devout. But he took the Testament, merely saying, "I'll carry it. It'll be good to stop a bullet." So weeks afterward, in the battle of Santiago, this soldier was hit, and left lying among the wounded. In the surgeon's hands he recovered consciousness, and heard him say, "It was a close call." A mauler bullet had been extracted from his breast that had barely reached his heart, and stopped there, because, as he presently learned, it had first passed through the Testament.

"LAY NOT THINE HAND UPON THE LAD: NEITHER DO THOU ANYTHING UNTO HIM"

fidelity. A lady went out one afternoon, leaving her little boy at his grandma's, with the promise that she would call for him when she returned home, which she expected would be about six o'clock. When that hour had nearly come, his grandma suggested that his mother might not come. "Yes, she will," said the boy confidently. Six o'clock struck, and still she had not arrived. Grandma said, "Well, I guess your mother will not come." "I know she will," he replied. "What makes you so sure?" "Because she said if she was not here by six o'clock she would surely come, and my mother never told me a lie." It was only a few minutes more when his mother came and took him home. Let us never forfeit the trust of others, whether of our parents or our children, or of teachers, or neighbors, or customers by breaking, or even forgetting, a promise.

A bad promise spoken had better be broken; But better not make such a promise to break. Both Abraham and Isaac, for their trust and obedience, were put on God's roll of honor, in Hebrews 11, in which Abraham's name alone appears twice. That list of the men and women of faith and faithfulness is continued in God's book

A MISSION BORN IN A RAILROAD CAR

191 Marietta street, Atlanta, Ga., stands a large, commodious brick building, known as the "Sheltering Arms Mission." Hundreds of men, women and children have been helped spiritually and physically through its instrumentality. Everybody in Atlanta has a kind word for it; it is the Jerry McAuley Mission of the City of the South. Its beginning was very humble. Miss Sue Holloway, an earnest and devoted Christian worker, visiting among the poor in the factory districts, was struck with the number of children running about the streets poorly clad, and apparently with no one to care for their bodily or spiritual welfare. She went to Mr. John F. Barclay, a good man, whom everybody in Atlanta knows and loves, and asked him to start a Sunday School in that quarter. On July 13, 1884, the school was organized in an old passenger coach, sidetracked near Winship's foundry, with a total attendance of seven, besides the teachers, who were Miss Holloway, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Barclay, and Judge H. E. W. Palmer. The mission outgrew the passenger coach, and moved into a room which had been used as a meat market.

The next migration was into an old tobacco factory, where a large room was secured, and then the mission started upon a new career of prosperity; the work broadened and great numbers were converted. In 1887 it had moved again, and taken up quarters in what had been a big bar-room. Through many trials and vicissitudes, and with many changes of name, this work, which started as a Sunday School in a derelict railroad car, struggled on and grew into the "Sheltering Arms," Atlanta's most notable mission.

The mission is set in that part of Atlanta peopled by the poor, the destitute and the sinful. Around it are factories, foundries, mills and railroad shops, with their multitudes of laboring men, women and children. With the sound of the ever going and coming trains, the clang of factory whistles, the gongs of electric cars, the rumble of wheels on rough stones, the place is one of perpetual noise. Men attracted by hope of work, but unable to obtain it, seek this quarter. None but the poor live here, and here they exist, often in great want and suffering and exposed to severe temptations. To the needs of this community the mission ministers in spiritual and material ways. In addition to the regular Sunday School every Sabbath morning, the temperance school in the afternoon and the services at night, there are week-day departments, all of which are crowded. The "Day Nursery" takes under its care the children of laboring people during working hours. In the night school working girls are given educational opportunities. There are manual training classes for boys.

The kindergarten rooms on the first floor are filled each forenoon with thirty-five of the roundest, brightest tots imaginable. Then there are classes for larger children. The library and reading room are for the benefit of all ages. In the laundry, girls are taught laundry work. On Saturday nights, mothers' meetings are held. Baths, sleeping-rooms, a lunch counter, are all features of the system by which the "Sheltering Arms" seeks to help the poor, wayfaring and needy. The Sewing Circle is composed of fifty prominent ladies of the city, who meet one day in each week. These ladies visit all through this section and distribute the clothing the Circle have made or collected. Mrs. Black, President of the Atlanta Free Kindergarten Association, is a warm friend of the Mission's little folks. Miss Draper, Miss Hawkins and Miss MacDougall are active members of a band of earnest young women who have shown great interest in the good work of the "Sheltering Arms." BELLE ROBINSON BUTLER.

UPLIFTING THE CRIMINAL

ANY comfortable, solid mortals, who have little sympathy and less imagination, will consider this title a paradox. Their theory is that any provision for moral regimen and devotional exercises in a penal institution is one of those kindly illusions which seeks to cast a pleasing veil over ugly facts. But to one sensitively alive to the grand paradox of the Christian religion itself—success through failure—the force and wisdom of official recognition and official fostering of religious teaching within prison walls will be apparent. In any event, there are hundreds of unfortunates who are constantly testifying their joy and gratitude that it is possible to have spiritual communion and devotional isolation, even beneath the shadow of a common jail.

George Sanderson, now in his second year as Chaplain Sing Sing prison, has peculiar aptitudes for his calling, and the influence of fifteen years of like service in the Albany County Penitentiary has stimulated their development. To-day with constancy and faith, he is a believer in that sure aid which enables some men to rise superior to an imperfect environment and misleading companions, and rescue a portion of themselves and a part of their lives for something nobler than success. Chaplain Sanderson's methods are worthy of careful study. His addresses to the men at the Sunday morning services are brief, pointed, salutary; the tone is always candid and moderate. No effort is spared to give variation of idea and fullness of treatment on all the ethical questions with which the world is struggling to-day. He carries on a constant and voluminous correspondence with those leaders of American thought whose names are at the command of their fellows. Among the speakers and workers who have responded in Sing Sing Chapel to the Chaplain's invitation are pastors of different denominations, Y. M. C. A. workers, merchants and business men, secretaries of Chambers of Commerce, Army and Navy officers (including Gen. O. O. Howard, U. S. A., Commander Williams, U. S. N., and others), Superintendents of Gospel Missions, Editors of religious newspapers, Gospel workers in foreign lands, and chaplains from other prisons.

An advanced course of Bible Studies, under the direction of Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman and other distinguished lecturers, ers, has also been a leading feature. Few congregations in the State, even in metropolitan pastorates, have been so generously provided for. As a complement to this teaching and worship, vocalists and musicians of note, many of high rank, have been heard in frequent praise services.

REV. GEORGE SANDERSON, CHAPLAIN OF SING SING

Chaplain Sanderson's experience has convinced him of the necessity and value of an effort made to teach the men. Careful observation is made each month with the idea of improving the character of the reading desired by those who draw books from the library, and each month additions are made—and sometimes expurgations—in the prison literature. The school is kept up to an average of 180 pupils, taught by three teachers, selected and guided by the Chaplain, who visits the classes each day. Here the men gain an insight into those studies essential to the business of life. Yet all of Chaplain Sanderson's work is only preliminary, being intended to create an interest and to compel attention on the part of the men. However important public exhortation and platform teaching may be, if they are to continue current and vital, they must be followed by that crowning virtue of uttered words—the doing of serviceable things.

Sing Sing's Chaplain gives the best of himself and of his days to personal contact with his wards. The patience, the skill, the tender and generous compassion, with which the Chaplain has labored in this connection, are deeply appreciated by all the inmates, and there are men there whose names first marked the prison index thirty years ago. It would be impossible in our limited space, to enumerate the cases in which spiritual aid and comfort have been brought to the men by Chaplain Sanderson in the twelve months past. There are many whose needs and griefs would have remained unknown, except through the instrumentality of Sunday visits to cell doors.

Sympathy and help!—if ever a being needs them on earth, it is the inmate of a cell. Personal touch! In no other way can one assist the convict to control his propensities and to ennoble his purposes. To aid and uplift, by spiritual and intellectual means, those who are lowest is the only way in which society can secure the maximum of protection, and afford the only hope for the regeneration of the criminal.

MY LITTLE UNKNOWN FRIEND

THE following beautiful story was written as part of her school work by a pupil of the Longfellow School, Peoria, Ill., a little girl of thirteen. It is sent us by her teacher:

One morning on my way to school, I passed a neglected cottage which had been vacated for some time. I noticed a woman, poorly but neatly dressed, washing the windows, and supposed that some poor family had moved there who could afford no better home. I don't know why, but somehow or other I thought about the little house and its new occupants all day during school. On my way home in the evening, there were nice clean sash curtains up at the windows, and the trasies all cleaned out of the front yard.

Next morning as I passed, the sash curtains were parted from that I suppose was the bedroom window. Sitting in a chair by the window was a little girl wrapped in a large shawl. She was very pale and thin, but her face was lit up by a pair of big blue eyes, which looked unnaturally large compared with her little pale face. Her hair was a mass of golden curls. When she saw me pass she smiled, and waved her hand and threw me a kiss. I was only too glad to be noticed by her; I waved my hand and threw a kiss in return.

I could hardly wait until school closed that evening so anxious was I to see if the little girl would still be in the window. When I got to the house sure enough she was there, and silently greeted me just as she had done before.

The next morning I asked my mother if I could take two apples to school, and receiving her permission I picked out one as nice as I could find and rubbed it hard until it shone, and then I started. When I reached the little girl's home, the lady whom I had seen before was out in the yard. I gave her the rosy apple and asked her if she would give it to the little girl. She seemed greatly pleased, and thanked me heartily. After that, every morning I left some little token. Sometimes an apple, sometimes a banana, or a flower. So the time passed on, every morning and evening I saw my little, unknown friend, and received her smile and the kiss which she threw; but every day I noticed her getting paler and thinner, and her eyes growing larger.

One morning as I passed, there was no little face at the window. The sash curtains were drawn together. I felt out of sorts all day and was so glad when school closed for the day. I hastened homeward, but still there was no girl to be seen. That evening mother spoke to me several times and wanted to know what made me so quiet. The next day it was the same—no little girl. The next there was crape on the door, and I understood all. A few days after I received permission from my mother to stay home from school and attend the funeral.

I do not pass the little house now on my way to and from school. Strangers have moved in, and I go two blocks out of my way, so as to avoid passing the place which had been the home of my Little, Unknown Friend. MABEL JOHNSON.

DAILY PRAYER

A Habit which Subjectively as well as Objectively Tends to Spiritual Development

WHY is it that so few people make daily prayer a habit? It would be interesting to know the reasons. Some, doubtless, do not pray because they think that God does not answer. With some, doubtless, there is the feeling that God knows our condition, is fully aware of our needs, and that there is no necessity to tell him of them. With others, the reason is to be found in a species of fatalism, which forbids them to hope that it is possible to change God's will. With the great majority, however, the reason probably lies in the absorbing nature of their daily concerns. Awakening from sleep, the engagements of the day rush upon the mind, and one problem after another presents itself for solution. Business questions must be decided; difficulties must be surmounted; transactions must be conducted on which serious losses or large gains depend. These things have been in abeyance for some hours, if the man is strong enough in mind to force them to hold off while he recuperates his mental powers by sleep. But rising in the morning, they come back, peremptorily demanding consideration. Prayer is then apt to be omitted, or to become a mere formality carried through while the mind is full of other things. Even persons who make a profession of Christianity often permit causes such as these to interfere with a practice that is the chief support and sustenance of spiritual life. The Apostle thought that wrong views and conduct in the observance of the Lord's supper was the reason why so much spiritual sickness existed in the Corinthian Church, but in our day the low spiritual tone in many churches may more surely be traced to the neglect of private daily prayer.

We would be less likely to neglect this means of grace if we held clearer views of the nature of prayer. It is remarkable how Christ reiterated the relation which lies at the basis of prayer. In his inimitable prayer he begins with "Our Father," and all through his ministry this idea of God's fatherhood was made prominent in his teaching. If, then, God is our father, what kind of children are we if we never approach him with words acknowledging the relationship? What kind of a son would that be who allowed days and weeks to slip by without going near his father or speaking to him? Even if in our hearts there is a doubt whether he will answer our prayers, our consciousness of favors received should bring us into his presence with words of thankfulness. Besides, there is the privilege of communion, which of itself ought to be sufficient to attract us to the presence of God. The fact that in prayer we are brought into contact with the Supreme Being who allows us to call him Father, is enough to make the time of communion with him a holy and precious privilege, which should never be curtailed or omitted. Even if we ask no favors, if we present no petitions, it is so great a privilege to be admitted into the divine presence that no one should be willing to forego it. To come there and pour into the divine ear the story of our sorrows, our regrets, our longings, assured of a sympathetic attention, is of itself a relief and a help. But it is difficult to believe that any child of God can think that it all ends there. We know not how God hears and answers prayer, but we cannot believe that he does refrain from answering. We may not get all that we ask. It is sometimes well that we should not. But in some way, often in some better way than we have planned, the answer does come.

How many a melancholy fall might have been prevented by this habit of daily prayer! Few of these failures are deliberately planned. Temptation comes and there is a partial yielding, followed by a season of remorse, and then comes another assault and again there is yielding, until the downward course becomes sure and rapid. If in the presence of God the ordeal that is coming were described and help were implored, how surely it would be granted! Many a battle has been fought and won on the knees. It is there that the struggle with temptation can be fought to a successful issue. Time and again in the experience of the child of God, the temptation has been turned aside or robbed of its power by prayer. It is worth while for any who have not made the experiment to put this prescription to the proof. If he knows that he is in danger of falling, if sad experience has proved to him his own weakness, and if he sincerely desires to overcome, let him state the case frankly on his knees, acknowledge his frailty and beseech help in the hour of trial. He will be astonished to find that in some way he has been delivered. God will not always deliver him, but he will give him an increase of strength so that he fights with more vigor, or there is some interposition of circumstances, which are not always so purely accidental as we think, which diminishes the force of the assault. The victory may be won in a way so natural that we think there is nothing supernatural in it; but so God works, and the victory was really won in the morning interview with the Father. Growth in grace, increase of moral strength, intenser love, stronger faith, and better usefulness all come from that daily prayer which brings us into contact with Omnipotence and with that Power which is working in us to the development of spiritual life.

MONT-LAWN'S LETTER-BAG

WHAT stories, funny and pathetic, fill the letter-bag which goes back and forth between our Children's Home and the Nyack post office every day! The letters that come from Hester street, or some other "Poverty Row," are often addressed in hands more ill-formed than those which go back, although the writers are adults—fathers and mothers, who are using their best skill and English to communicate with their little boys and girls who are having a good time at Mont-Lawn. Sometimes, as you hand such a letter out to an eager little recipient, you think: "Perhaps that poor mother scrimped her breakfast or her dinner to buy a stamp." The letters that go back in the bag—these are the ones that make you smile in spite of yourself, although the eyes of the writer are fixed upon you while he waits to receive compliments on the work of art which he has produced at infinite pains, and with the expenditure of much precious time which might have been employed swinging in a scup or picking flowers in a field. Here are a few specimens which the writer was privileged to read:

Dear Mother. I am going to stay here to days I get eat 3 times in a day. Then we go to sleep. The name of the country is Nyack. I send the best regards to all. Your loving son, Joe.—Dear father and mother. I am very far from you—the air is very fresh and enuff the eating is very good an' they let me have all the eating I want. Your loving daughter, Bessie.—Dear mamma. I will tell you something about the place where I am we like it very much here we could eat as much as we want and also drink milk. Tommy wants rite, too, but he can't. He don't have hedake no more an' he's got fat I wisht they'd let me stay three weeks like Tommy has. He says: "tell mama, I see dot well."—Dear mother. Having a fine time. Blackberries are ripe. Willie.—Dear mother. Instead of Baby crying, she is always laughing and forever eting she has a very good appetite she laughs all the time in bed an' kinks me a great dele. She has got well. Annie.—Dear mamma. They let me help make beds every morning. My teacher is so kind. I love to help. When I go home, I will bring you some flowers.—Dear father. I am enjoying myself and I like this country an I hope you have got well an can get some work an I send zoo kisses. Johnny.—Dear aunt. We like this country very much we are up at five o'clock in the morning an go picking berries and have grand times. There's plenty to ete an milk an you can play on grass an there's scups an plenty of air here.—Dear mother. I got here for supper I drank 4 mugs of nice fresh milk I am feeling verry good. It was jolly on the boat, an then we rode in the stage an we had hominy for breakfast an there's a nice new cottage called Hope Cottage an there's a tree behind it an it's got green apples on it an they wont let me ete 'em and so now no more from me at this time I am going to pick berries an swim in the pool an go up the mountain an there are scups here. Tom.

"I WANT TO WRITE A LETTER"

The following explains itself:

Dear, Unknown Friends: I have heard of you from my loving teacher. All the teachers here are kind to me. Now, I write you that I am in the country, I am having a nice time here. I am very thankful to you for giving the money to send me to the country. Now I will tell you what we do in the country. We go out picking berries, we go to chapel two times a day. The teachers take us for walks, they tell nice stories to us, and we have got a big tent here where we eat in. When we go to chapel or tent we get in a line two by two. We had a very nice journey coming on the boat. We were singing and laughing on the boat. As I have wrote all I can think of, I will close. Your grateful friend, Gussie.

It took her a long time to write that letter, and she put much hard work and patient pains into its construction. Our children are under twelve; they are from the slums; they have not had fair opportunities; few can write an intelligent letter of thanks, however full their little hearts may be. The poorest, the neediest, the most afflicted are those least able to express by pen the gratitude their wistful eyes would speak could they look up into the faces of those who have helped them by gifts and prayer. Only $3 gives one child an outing at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9, three; for $36, twelve waifs may be made happy. Send cash contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York; gifts of clothing should be expressed to The Christian Herald Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Gospel Work in the Mountains

From time to time I have read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, accounts of the work of evangelists in western North Carolina and the mountains bordering on the Tennessee line. Much work has been done in that region of late years by the Presbyterian synod of North Carolina.

Now I wish to tell your readers of a work inaugurated in Ashe and Alleghany, the two northwestern counties of this State, by the First Presbyterian Church, South, of Greensboro, N. C. Some three years ago this church employed an evangelist, and sent him into Ashe. Then there was not a Presbyterian in the county, so far as we know, and but few churches of any denomination, these few being many miles apart. There are now four new churches and four Sabbath Schools organized. A little over a year ago this church sent yet another evangelist to Alleghany, and his first report, recently received, shows gratifying progress. Some ten years ago, this church sent a missionary into Stokes County, where Presbyterianism was scarcely known; now there are some ten churches and many Sunday Schools as a result; and the field is about self-supporting. Called Away

A friend in Santa Rosa, Calif., writes, telling of the recent death of Mrs. J. L. Burchard, who "loved THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so much. She had taken it for years, had read it with great pleasure and had found much comfort and encouragement in its pages." "After she could not read, I read the paper to her," her aged husband says. Mrs. Burchard was seventy-two at the time of her death; her father was a preacher, Rev. Jonas Heath, of West Virginia; her mother, Margaret Heath, was a devout Christian; and no wonder their daughter early gave her heart to God. In 1848, she became the wife of Rev. J. L. Burchard, who was just beginning an itinerant's life on our wild frontiers. Three children survive her—Dr. Leonidas S. Burchard, Mrs. Mary M. Twor ley, of Oakland, and Daniel W. Burchard, a prominent lawyer of San Francisco. The poor and friendless always found a friend in this good woman; again and again she opened her heart and home to receive orphan children, and besides those of her own flesh and blood, many to whom she was as a mother are left to mourn her.

"She carried sunshine with her" is the beautiful tribute her friends pay to the memory of Mrs. Mary E. Hopkins Day, who, on June 18, went to the "Better Land." In times of greatest bereavement and sorrow she would try to find the silver lining to the cloud. She was born in Rumford Me., March 14, 1848; her father was a minister of God, Rev. Eliphaz S. Hopkins, and from her youth she was a follower of the Lord. During her last sickness, she would want her sister to read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and would often remark: "How good it is to hear those words!" She wished her daughter, Mrs. Effie Williamson, to carry some of the papers home and read them. It seemed to be her greatest anxiety to have all her friends share in the rich blessings of the Gospel.

BREAKFAST ON DRINK

Coffee Makes Many Dyspeptics.

"Coffee and I had quite a tussle," years ago I was advised by the doctor to the use of coffee, for I had a chronic case of dyspepsia and serious nervous troubles, which did not yield to treatment. I was so addicted to coffee that it seemed an impossibility to quit, but when I was put on Postum Cereal Food Coffee, there was no trouble in making the change, and today I am a well woman.

One of the lady teachers in our public schools was sick and nervous. Frequently the only thing she took for breakfast was a cup of coffee; I urged her to try leaving off the coffee and use Postum instead. We went far as to send her a sample from my box to give her directions. She now uses Postum but Postum Food Coffee and told me a story time ago that she was perfectly well.

It is easy to make good Postum, once a person becomes accustomed to it. Put a heaping teaspoon to the pint of water, after it comes up to a boil, see that from time on it boils fifteen or twenty minutes, then use good cream and you have a drink that would be relished by the Queen. Be sure and put a piece of butter size of a penny to prevent boiling over." Mrs. L. E. Whittaker, Kidder, Mo. Postum is sold by all first-class grocers at 15 and 25 cent packages.

WON TO CHRIST BY A COMRADE

How Bishop Henry W. Warren was Brought to the Cross by a Soul-seeking Schoolmate

...BY...
REV. LOUIS
ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

THE Mecca of Massachusetts Methodists is at beautiful Wilbraham, nestling among the hills among as handsome New England scenery as one might hope to find anywhere. It is there that Henry W. Warren, an earnest, diligent young man, found himself in pursuit of an education. He was normal but not religious. No deep personal religious hunger had yet seized him. Among his acquaintances made among the students was one which was very fortunate for him. This was John H. Mansfield, who afterwards became a faithful minister, who has all his life been a soul-seeker, and still pursues that work at Gardner, Massachusetts.

Young Mansfield had set his heart on winning some of his young student friends

Mansfield prayed as well as he could, and then Henry Warren breathed out his penitent desires to God. They went to class-meeting together. When it came his turn to speak, Warren frankly told the class his determination, and asked them to pray for him. The next Sunday night, at the prayer-meeting in church, the pastor, the Rev. Henry Baker, asked anyone who desired to seek the Lord to come forward for prayers. When this invitation was given, John Mansfield went out into the audience and found young Warren and his room-mate, William A. Smith, the son of a Methodist preacher. They were standing together, and at Mansfield's kindly entreaty, they both went forward to the altar and sought the Lord, but they did not find peace during that meeting.

At that time Mansfield was praying, and had been for a week, for a deeper burden of soul for sinners. After the meeting he went to his room and prayed for the young men, and for himself, and retired, but not to sleep. He was so deeply interested in the salvation of Warren and Smith that he continued to weep and pray until the morning dawned. The following night he found his two young friends and took them for a walk. He counselled with them the best he knew how, and advised them to go to their room and give themselves to God, and believe he accepted them. Mansfield, on leaving them, went to his own room, where he continued to weep and pray, in intense earnestness, until two o'clock in the morning, when his feeling of anxiety all left him, and almost immediately he fell asleep. The next day, when he went up to prayers at the Academy, he found the two young men for whom he had been praying, standing on the upper terrace, with faces full of delight, waiting to tell him of their new-found joy. A little after midnight, as they lay thinking and praying, one said to the other: "It seems to me I feel better." The other replied: "That is just what I was thinking."

John H. Mansfield recalls that experience with great joy and thanksgiving to God. William A. Smith graduated at the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., in 1854, and became an honored and eminent minister in the Rook River Conference of the Methodist Church. The fame of Bishop Henry W. Warren is known in all the Christian world, and he himself has been the evangel of salvation to multitudes of men.

There ought to be in this a message of encouragement and hope to Christian young men and women in the academies and colleges of the land. It is often possible for faithful young servants of Christ to win to the Lord their school associates and thereby to start in motion forces for righteousness that will bless the world through all the years to come. The school is one of the best fields on earth in which to gather sheaves for the Master.

FAITH UNDER PROOF

Abraham's Confidence in God Put to the Test

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

ABRAHAM is the only Old Testament type of God the Father, and in the tremendous test through which he would bring his faithful servant, he would also make known something of what it cost him to redeem mankind. Abraham had believed God that he should be the father of a great multitude, and that he should have a son; and now comes a command from the Lord, utterly incomprehensible, but for the words with which it is introduced: "And it came to pass after these things that God did prove Abraham" (Gen. 22: 1, R. V.). "Take now thy son, thine only son, whom thou lovest, even Isaac, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." The very last communication of God to Abraham which is mentioned was: "In Isaac shall thy seed be called" (Gen. 21: 12), how, then, could it be the mind of God that this child of promise should be slain?

It is not the office of faith to understand, but to obey. Was Isaac more Abraham's property than God's, or more God's property than Abraham's? Were the promises of God of more importance to Abraham or to God himself? The man of faith looks on everything from God's side, and, therefore, bows in loyal submission before his God. If Isaac was to be the man through whom the promises should be fulfilled, and if, for his own purpose, God would have Abraham to take his life, and offer him up in sacrifice, it remained for God to justify his Word and his character, even though it should be in raising Isaac from the dead. "By faith, Abraham being tried, offered up Isaac; yea, he that had gladly received the promises was offering up his only-begotten son; even he of whom it was said, In Isaac shall thy seed be called; accounting that God is able to raise up, even from the dead; from whence he did also in a parable receive him back" (Heb. 11: 17-19, R. V., marg.). No resurrection from the dead had ever yet taken place on earth; but God could, if his Word required it, bring him back from the dead. God could work a miracle, but he could not deny himself, his Word must be fulfilled.

So when Abraham had received the command of God, he spent no time in reasoning over how, if Isaac were slain, God's Word could be accomplished; nor did he consider the cost to his deep fatherly love for the son for whom he had waited twenty-five years (comp. Gen. 12: 4; 17: 17). Abraham lived for God, he was a father for God, not for himself; Isaac had been given him for God, that his Word might be justified, and his purposes carried out. And, therefore, just when it cost him most, this true man of God set on one side every personal consideration, "rose early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son; and he clave the wood for the burnt-offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him." Prompt obedience is the proof of real faith in God. God is equal to all the consequences which his commands entail.

"On the third day, Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off." What days of agony those days would have been had he been occupied either with his feelings or with his reasonings! But when the heart of a child of God, under a severe test, bows in complete and joyful resignation to his will, cost what it may, the Spirit of God fills that heart with adoration. If God can trust his child with such a test, he gives exceptional grace for the occasion, which lifts him out of the atmosphere of the visible, and in the light of eternity he sees things from the standpoint of God. Thus, when he saw the place afar off, Abraham, instead of being filled with agony that the time of parting with the son in whom all his hopes were centred, was at hand, he faltered not, but said to the young men: "Abide ye here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder, and we will worship, and come again to you." "We will worship!" Abraham counted on Isaac as ready to be a willing sacrifice as soon as he should know the will of God. He had trusted God for this. But also he could say: "We will come again to you." Was not this a word of faith at such a moment?

The servants remained with the ass, the son went up to sacrifice. What a picture of the world and worldly Christians! They remain with the earthly, while the men of faith, as sons of God, follow the only-begotten Son of God on his path of sacrifice. And now came a critical moment. Isaac understood the offering of sacrifices, and he missed the victim. "My father... behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" "God will provide himself the lamb for the burnt-offering, my son." Between this moment and the moment of the actual offering, that father and son must have come to an understanding. Isaac must have come to know God's command and to be willing, for "they went both of them together." These words are significant. Abraham was an old man; Isaac in the vigor of youth. If the latter had not been willing to be bound and laid upon the altar, his father could not have forced him. They came to the place, and in building the altar and arranging the wood, Abraham was in spirit laying himself as much as he laid the bound Isaac on the altar; father and son were wholly at God's disposal.

OUR FATHER'S COMFORT

DEAR Lord, what comfort thou wilt give, When we will humbly trust in thee; Thou wilt uplift our trusting souls, Till we thy wisdom learn to see; Thou wilt us free from many cares, And teach us of the noble life, Until our souls will seem to live Above the world of care and strife. The soul can never come to harm, When placing all its trust in thee; It will be near the heavenly way, In Paradise will seem to be; And sweet content will bless the heart, With happiness it will be filled, And those who rest within thy care Will find their every trouble stilled. —MARTHA SHEPARD LIPPINCOTT. A CHANGE BREAKFAST.

Getting Ready for Warm Weather.

As the warm days approach, it is well to give some thought to an easy way to prepare breakfast. A food that is already cooked and simply needs to be treated with a little cold milk or cold cream is ideal on that point, and such a food can be found in Grape-Nuts, at 15 cents per package.

It is sold by all grocers, and is so highly concentrated that not more than three or four teaspoonfuls are required for the cereal part of the meal. This makes the food very economical and does not overtax the stomach with a great volume.

BISHOP HENRY W. WARREN

to Christ. Greatly admiring and loving young Warren, he marked him in thought as one of a special list for whom he would pray, and determined that he would by Christ's help answer his own prayers, as far as possible, through his personal efforts.

One evening in the autumn of 1845, when, as Bishop Warren says, "the October day on the hills at Wilbraham was beautiful as only New England hills can be," John Mansfield asked Henry Warren to go with him for a short walk. The walk was necessarily very brief, for the rotation did not close until four forty-five, and they had to be back at the chapel for prayers at five. They spent the fifteen minutes strolling out to a clump of grove near by, and then, after a few moments' conversation, strolling back again to the academy building. Young Mansfield had been praying for this chance, and he improved the brief opportunity to present to his friend the blessings of the religious life, and the claims of Christ upon his service. Warren was honest and candid, and gave the subject due attention, but did not impress Mansfield as being deeply interested. After a few days of prayer for him, and several conversations, Mansfield invited him to come to his room, and go with him to class-meeting the next Saturday night, as Warren promised to do so. When the time arrived, however, Mansfield waited in vain for him, but as he did not appear, he thought his friend had promised more than he had courage to perform, and was giving a little. The next time he met him, he reminded him of the broken promise, and found he had been unavoidably detained. The invitation was renewed for the next Saturday, and on that evening Warren appeared. Mansfield said to him, "Now, I suppose your mind is made up to seek the Lord. If so, we might as well begin here. Let us get down before the Lord, and I will pray for you and you pray for yourself."

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Sept. 18

1. In all the recorded acts of faith in the New or Old Testaments, performed by mortal man, what was the most marvellous, wonderful, and far-reaching, considering the time and the circumstances?

2. What is the origin of the name "Red Sea"?

3. What form of punishment is most advisable in dealing with children who need correction?

4. Is it wise for a young lady, who wishes to advance the Christian cause, to make a vow never to accept in marriage one who is not a Christian?

5. When a man is in debt, is he justified in spending any of his income for other than actual necessities while the debt remains unliquidated? Has he a right to indulge in vacation (for self or family), in Christmas or birthday gifts, or in charity or church offerings? Define the limit of his rights, as near as possible, under such circumstances.

Questions of the Week

1. How can a pastor carry out effectively the Scriptural injunction, "Go out and compel them to come in"?

The revised version is more correct, "constrain them to come in," by moral and spiritual persuasion, not by physical force. The pastor does this in different ways: 1. By the excellence of his preaching and the spirituality of the worship he conducts. 2. By his personal influence in friendly intercourse from day to day. 3. By Gospel invitations, private instruction, and personal appeals whenever he can get some one's attention and win his confidence. W. W. KILPATRICK.

Our ordinary experience is in this, as in so many other duties, a guide to us. We have all received a variety of invitations from friends and acquaintances. There is the formal "at home," when visitors will be received. There is the polite invitation to call at any time, which frequently means no time. There is the more cordial invitation that our friend will be glad to see us when it is convenient. All these are polite, and sociable, and friendly; but they are very different from the invitation of the man who is really intent on having us come. He wants to know when we will come; he calls to urge us to come; wants to know what prevents our coming, will send a conveyance, or will try to remove any other obstacle. He is so persistent and urgent that we understand how sincerely he desires us to come, and we feel compelled to go. The pastor who goes to the people whom he knows to be unconverted, and tries to get into their confidence to learn what it is that keeps them from Christ; pleads with them and presses the invitation upon them, both in the church and in their homes, is the one who carries out the Scriptural injunction to "compel them to come in." J. B. INFREE.

2. Is a lady of the house justified in telling her servant to say to callers, whom she does not wish to see, "She is not at home," when she is?

No, assuredly not, for not only does she sin herself, but causes another to lie, and sets a bad example generally. If it is not convenient to see her callers she had better have her servant tell them so in a courteous manner, or if she feels that she cannot do that, she had better receive them, even though it is inconvenient and disagreeable; for at least she has not sinned or influenced others to do so. In the sight of God, a lie is a lie whatever the motive. SALLIE L. DUNLAP.

In one sense, the announcement is an untruth. "At Home" has acquired a distinctive meaning, and intimates that the host or hostess is prepared to receive. Therefore, "not at home" might reasonably be construed to mean simply that the host is not prepared or disposed to receive. It is, however, an unfortunate form of expression, and a decidedly clumsy one, but not a lie, if rightly understood. Far better were it to say, "Miss or Mrs. or Mr. So-and-So is not visible," as they do in France, where such forms are made more convenient for social usage. There should be some reasonable way of declining an untimely call without impoliteness or untruth. Let us be generous, and lay the blame for the awkward "not at home" not on the individual, but upon a defect of the system. It would offend no sensible person to be informed that "Mrs. So-and-So regrets that she cannot receive guests to-day, but will be pleased to have you call on ——" (naming her At Home day, or some other convenient time). Any caller, with proper respect for the rights of others, would be willing to accept such an explanation. MARIA AYLMER.

Yes, certainly. "At Home" is a society phrase, coined, like many others, to meet demands which have arisen with the development of the social world, and whose meanings, hence, are idiomatic and not literal. "At man; the crimson, the redemption; the white, the purity of the soul "washed in the blood"; the gold, the radiant soul of eternal felicity. S.

4. Is a pastor, who has no special need of a rest during the summer, justified in going off for two or three months, just because he enjoys the change, and leaving his flock shepherdless?

I think not. While there are some pastors overworked (and no man should begrudge them a vacation), and few are overpaid, yet the congregations that require an unreasonable amount of service from their pastor are few. Then there are occasional days during the year in which he is not busy, and which he can and does use for recreation and rest. The winter is usually recognized as "harvest time" for the Church, but only too often that which is gathered in in the winter is lost in the summer, and especially is this liable to be the case when the pastor goes away for several months at a season when the Devil seems to be unusually busy. A. A. FORSTER.

The most inspiring victory ever won, was on the occasion when the great Shepherd took a vacation to the coast of Tyre, to heal the child of a Canaanitish woman. He echoed the disciple's words when he said: "It is not meet to give the children's loaf unto and we exact more from them than we could possibly perform ourselves.

ELLA J. PIERCE.

5. Was the miracle at Pentecost (Acts 2) wrought on the preachers or the hearers?

The question is, "Did God's power operate upon the preachers as to enable them to speak in a language hitherto unknown to them, or, did it so operate upon the ears and understandings of the hearers as to make the voices of the apostles sound like their own tongue, and convey to them as clear a meaning as if such were the case?" The former is evidently true, and the miracle was wrought upon the preachers, because: 1. That the idea conveyed by a reading of the passage cited. 2. That is what the prophet said took place (Isa. 28: 11, 12). Paul quoted this passage (I. Cor. 14: 21), as applying especially to the ability to speak "with other tongues" under the Gospel. 3. Christ definitely promised these apostles that they should have this ability (Mark 16: 17). 4. It was a power that existed widely, and for a considerable period in the early Church. Paul had this power (I. Cor. 14: 18). It was a power "set in the Church" (I. Cor. 12: 28). It is a power which all did not have (I. Cor. 13: 1), yet Paul desired it for all (I. Cor. 14: 5), and so, presumably, was possessed by other than the apostles (I. Cor. 14: 18). B. F. WHITTEN.

The particular miracle of Pentecost referred to in the question was that of the tongues of people of various nationalities at languages gathered in Jerusalem at the time every one heard in their own mother tongue the words of the disciples that were uttered by the mighty power of God with the baptism of the Holy Spirit. It is very evident that even though the disciples "spoke in other tongues" as the Spirit gave them utterance, they could speak but one certain language at one time, and the Scriptures do not suggest otherwise. The marvel lay in the fact that the multitude all heard in their own various tongues, while but one language was spoken—a process that might be termed the transmutation of language in the passage through space from speaker to auditors, the separate and distinct and different phenomena produced in each person according to the various nationalities constituting the miraculous attestation of God's power. WALTER W. HUBBARD.

Miscellaneous Questions

Eva. Is a marriage ceremony performed, the Sabbath day lawful? and if so, in what cases?

Counselor G. H. Crawford, 49 Wall Street, N. Y. City, gives this answer to the foregoing: "To answer fully would require the amendment of the statutes of all the States and Territories in the Union, which would mean several days' work. The following, however, may be sufficient: At common law, marriage ceremony duly solemnized on Sunday is valid, and this is true in every State and Territory in the Union where the common law prevails, unless there be some special statute to the contrary. We are not aware of any such statute, but, for greater security, the inquirer should consult the statutes of the particular State which he or she has in view. Mrs. T. S., Pontiac, Mich. (and others) How many years did it take Noah to build the ark?"

Gen. 6: 3 would indicate that 120 years was allowed for the work of warning and preparation. Just how much of this period was actually occupied in constructing the ark cannot be known.

Annie B., Rochford, S. Dak. We never saw of it.

Francis C. A. C., Ybor City, Fla. We repeatedly expressed our views regarding acts of sorcery, divination and spiritualism as illegal. They have not changed, and are based on Scriptural grounds.

Dresses, blouses, trousers, underwear, sleepers, hats and shoes, are all acceptable, and will aid us in clothing our ragged waifs, and you are doing a welcome kindness by sending a list of your own children have outgrown to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Several correspondents have asked what the Vice-President Roosevelt attends. He is a member of the Dutch Reformed Church. His father was one of the trustees of the Collegiate Church, New York City, and attended the Twenty-ninth Street Fifth Avenue church: his brother and first wife were Presbyterians, and were buried from Dr. Hall's Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church. His second wife is an Episcopalian, and he attends that church with her, although (until he married the second time) he regularly attended the Presbyterian Church, of which his father was also a trustee.

home" signifies readiness on the part of the lady of the house to receive callers. Not "at home" means that she is otherwise engaged, and does not necessarily imply that she is not in the house. An "At Home" is a stated occasion on which the hostess receives her guests, and is a term equivalent, in some degree, to the formal military expression, "on parade." MRS. F. E. FROST.

The term "not at home" has come to have a meaning of its own, and does not necessarily imply the absence of the person in question. In this accepted sense, one is guilty of giving no false impression nor acting an untruth in allowing its use. In these days of intense activity, it is woman's privilege to claim some precious hours as her very own, when she shall be free from all intrusion and interruption. The well-bred, common-sense woman, understanding and sympathizing, has no thought of questioning, nor of taking offense, when told that her friend is not at home, for she, in return, claims the same privilege. MAY STELLE.

3. What was the "Book without words," and where and when was it published?

This literary curiosity was published in England, and was so called because, after the title page, it contained not a single word. It is a religious allegory, devised by a religious enthusiast, and the thought is in the symbolic color of its leaves, of which two are black, two crimson, two pure white, two gold. The black symbolizes the unregenerate heart of dogs." Her reply more than rewarded him for his journey: "True, Lord, but the dogs partake of the crumbs which fall beneath the Master's table." It was a pearl from a heap of charcoal. No other mother has ever surpassed in quickness of comprehension of truth as this one did, or have any received a greater blessing. Be it unto thee even as thou wilt. If a pastor's faith leads him on such a vacation, let him go and take his disciples with him that they may rejoice in the victory. J. FLOMERFELT.

If a pastor has faithfully performed all the duties which come to a pastor (of even a small church) from 1st of September till the last of June, he is, in my opinion, in need of a rest and change, if he is to be, and do, what he should the following fall and winter. The strain on the nerves and brain of a pastor is very great, and if he be so strong and cheery that he does not show a "need" of rest, that is no reason for deciding he does not need one. I do not believe in a "flock being left shepherdless"—but I do believe in the flock being willing and glad for their pastor to go away for a time, and making it easy for him to go (and that there may be no reproach upon the name of Christ and the Church by being without a pastor) that they provide a supply for at least part of the time while he is away. Think of how he has been at the "beck and call" of all, in sorrow or in joy—in sickness or health. We too often think that a minister (and his wife) are not human beings,

GENERAL VIEW OF SADDLE MOUNTAIN CAMP

THE ARBOR, WHERE THE MEETINGS ARE HELD

THE RED MEN'S PRAIRIE TABERNACLE

MEMORABLE Sunday it was. At the foot of Saddle Mountain, the most picturesque spot of the Wichita range, there were camped about four hundred Indians and perhaps a hundred white people. Tents and teepees stretched out in all directions, some being furnished with all the home comforts—beds, tables, chairs, dishes, etc.—other contained bare necessities; a few branches piled at one side and covered with a blanket served as a bed, with a few dishes, completed the outfit.

The noise and din of many voices, the children playing, and people moving to and fro, transformed the usually quiet and lonely prairie into the busy, active life of a town.

Altogether, it was a most picturesque and interesting spectacle. The mountains and green grass of the prairie made a most beautiful background for the white tents and teepees. Most of the Indians were clad in gorgeously colored camp clothes. Many of the men, however, though they wear citizens' clothes, cling tenaciously to the blanket, which they rap about their bodies. In summer-time, they substitute a sheep or the blanket.

A large arbor, erected by the Indians, required a whole week of hard work. Large, heavy poles, had to be cut and securely set in the earth, and then the top was covered with branches, affording a deep shade. Appropriate mottoes were hung inside: "Long in darkness we have waited for the shining of the light"; "Walk as children of light"; "There shall be no night there, and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth light"; "The Lord is my light and my salvation"; "A light shineth in a darkness"; "There is a light in the valley"; "Arise, shine, for thy light cometh."

Within a short distance was the Baptist mission station, called in Kiowa, Dawo-kee-boum-gee-k'op, meaning, God's light-on-the-mountain. This name was given by one of the Indians, for he said:

"Everybody sees the sun, it gives light to everybody. We want Indians to get out of the dark, and let Jesus shine in their hearts so every one can see, like a light on the mountain. This mission is God's light on the mountain."

A hand-bell was rung for service. Steadily a stream of people came forth from tents and teepees; slowly the arbor was filled, until there must have been some hundred men, women and children congregated. Hymns were sung in English and Kiowa, followed by prayers by whites and Indians; then came a helpful, appealing sermon, which was interpreted to the Indians. Earnest solicitation was made to those who wanted to walk the Jesus road, and nineteen candidates, men women and children, presented themselves for baptism. They were examined, and their simple, touching testimonies were a pledge of their faith.

One real old man said, "I do not talk much, I never say nothing. I keep quiet and hide things in my mind, I am old and poor, and nearly all my friends are gone. I feel I am carrying a load and it is getting too much for me. I want to walk in the Jesus road and he will roll off my burden." His friend Big Tree, a Christian, and once a famous war chief, got up and said: "I am so glad; he never talk and I do not know how he feels. We have been together in war and I see him all the this road and I want to be with them. I love Jesus and give him my whole heart, and I am happy to-day because I give myself to Jesus."

A young brave of the Kiowa tribe, dressed in Indian fashion, who had presented himself, said, he had wanted for a long time to be a Christian, but he had not been willing to give up everything. One time he had been willing to give up gambling and ghost-dancing, but just one thing he wanted to keep and that was mescal; but this time he was willing to give up mescal and all, and give his heart to Jesus.

It was long past noon when this service was ended, but it was harvest time, and such a happy ingathering it was.

Early in the afternoon, all again assembled to listen to a doctrinal sermon on baptism. Then the procession was formed to march to the place of baptism, a little clear pool in the hill-side, fed by several small streamlets. The procession was fully a mile long, all singing, and marching two by two. It was a very impressive sight, all nature was radiant, and the brightly-clad Indians, with their brown skins and black hair, with here and there a sprinkling of white people, made it all very picturesque, and all this but added to the solemnity of the occasion.

All gathered on either side of the pool, those nearest the water's edge sitting down so as to afford a view to those behind. Quiet and reverence reigned, and the stillness was only broken by the words of baptism and the singing of a hymn. After this service, all scattered quietly and solemnly.

The evening meeting was one of intense interest. There were Kiowas, Comanches, Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Caddos, Wichitas, Cherokees and whites in the congregation. As the majority were Kiowas, the general interpreter was a Kiowa, but all that was said was interpreted to each little group by one of their number who could understand English. It certainly was of more than profound interest to note that these simple, earnest Christians—men with the faith of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob—are the very men who were chiefs in the great Indian warfare of the Southwest, with all its bloodshed and cruelty. The meeting was one of heart-to-heart talks. It was almost midnight before all were willing to say "Good-by," for they felt it good to be there and were loath to leave the house of the Lord.

There were many talks and outward manifestations that these Indians are not only groping and stumbling along the "good road" but are reaching out unto the light, the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

time; but I am glad he can now give his load to Jesus. One little fellow, not more than nine or ten years old, looked up as his turn came, saying, "I always come, and every time they tell me I am too little. For a long time I want to come; but I would not give up, and I walk in the Jesus road all the time, and now I come again." His mother, when asked about him, said, "His is a good boy, always talking about Jesus and wants to be a Christian."

Among the girls, a school-girl said in her earnest way, "I know I am young, but I feel I ought to walk on the Jesus road. My brother and my mother are on

GAVE HIS LIFE TO THE WORK

THE infant Protestant Filipino Church has been stunned by the sudden death of its pastor, Leonard P. Davidson. He was only fifteen months in these islands, but in that short time saw as much result from his service as most missionaries see in a lifetime. On arriving here in February, 1900, he applied himself to the Spanish language with enthusiasm, so that in six months he could fluently lead services. His first practical use of Spanish was to perform the marriage rite for hundreds who thronged his Manila study. All the Evangelical missionaries here are importuned to marry couples who for a long time, perhaps, have been living together without any marriage ceremony, because the Friars demanded such exorbitant fees.

While insurgents were still hiding in thickets and mountain fastnesses, ready to bolo a stray traveler, Mr. Davidson was riding through the enemy's country, receiving the most friendly reception. His happy, pure face, and words of cordial greeting, no doubt often warded off danger. The warm heart shone through the kindly eyes and disarmed malicious designs.

In every town scattered over the islands, our soldier boys are stationed. To these Mr. Davidson had a mission. These soldiers loved him, following him to his home in Manila, for those tactful talks he had given in their barracks were full of pith and stuck to them. They would often walk long distances to see him once more. He started and successfully carried on three Christian Endeavor Societies, one for our soldiers, and two for the Filipinos. Following the ancient Latin style, these Filipinos use the first name in addressing a friend. "Senor Leonardo" was the Filipino style of addressing their beloved Pastor. Before he came to the Philippines, he had been for a few years a pastor in Tulsa, Indian Territory, where he had built up a church. He was married, when beginning his Indian Territory work, to Miss Marion Leavitt, of Massachusetts. After the death of his young wife he came to these far-away isles.

Our last Sunday of service was a typical day. Leaving Manila at seven A.M., we took a launch for Cavite, where Filipino Christians were waiting to welcome and conduct us to the cockpit, where usually the fowls fight. The folding organ was set up, and we were soon lustily singing Moody and Sankey hymns in Spanish. From that service we went to a well-to-do Filipino's house to lunch, holding an open-air service in the grounds immediately afterward. Then we took carriages for the next town. It was a Roman Catholic Festa day, and every one was in holiday attire. Mangoes and pineapples in profuse abundance were being vended, found the gathering was one we could not consistently ignore. There were musicians, and a full orchestra; a prima donna was warbling elegantly, and there was much merry-making and dancing.

So we reluctantly pressed on to our destination, where we had another interesting open-air service, the people listening on Mr. Davidson's words. Soon the shadows began to lengthen, and I went home to Manila, while the tireless evangelist went on to hold his fourth service that day in another town, a few miles from Cavite. The temptation to overwork was so strong that he overtaxed his body.

The grief of the Filipinos over his death was very touching. They have already held an impromptu meeting, and decided to send a delegation to America to have a monument to be placed on his grave. Monument to such a hero, he will never be found in marble. But in the Eternal Home land, he will welcome a multitude of souls—as one by one they go to meet him.

The urgent call to those who may receive the Gospel is not for money for this work, although money is always most necessary. We need consecrated, earnest young men, who will take up this work so suddenly dropped.

This is a golden hour for these islands. Time must be lost in pressing forward the most wonderful opening put before our nation. To preach Jesus, and give his Word to these people so eager to receive it. We have seen by past experience in South America and France, that when people leave the church of Rome they do not accept at once the truth. If left to their own devices, they are sure to become infidels and sceptics. In five, or at the most ten years they are lost to God, and have become so indifferent to the truth that no impression made on them to lead them Godward.

There are fifty islands of good size in this group that have never yet seen a Bible or heard the simple Gospel. The apostle of preaching Mr. Davidson pursued an ideal one. Preaching and traveling from day to day, visiting in a few weeks!

A VISIT TO A KURDISH CHIEF'S BRIDE

By DR. HANNAH YOSEPH
Our Correspondent at Maragha, Persia

IN my last letter, I was at Miandab, where I had journeyed from Maragha. About three miles from Miandab is the famous aqueduct of Hulaku Khan, which has been dug right into the everlasting rocks. On the upper part of the opening are carved two lion-like beasts, facing each other. Between their feet is a simple but ruggedly (probably hastily) engraved cross. It seemed to me as if, though, it is there in the effort of making peace between these beasts,—the Cross has been trampled down upon, hurt, wounded,—and it lay there bleeding at their feet and at their mercy. Have not the Christians in the East suffered in like way?

After a pleasant ride we dismounted at the hospitable palace of Mosbahy Dwan, a Kurdish chief.

A month before, we had heard that he was to be married, and thought to find the wedding joys and ceremony over; but it was not so.

The mother of his beautiful children (four daughters and three sons), having died, he has brought—and it would be more correct to say bought—in marriage the daughter of another prominent Kurdish chief, and the bridal festivities were not over. I was taken at once to the bride's apartment, where she was being waited upon by a dozen maids, of whom four were her own slaves—part of the dowry she had brought with her.

"Salam aleikum," I said. "Aleika salam," a dozen voices responded, as all rose to receive me, the bride shaking hands in European style. She was dressed in bright red, green, yellow and black silks and satins. Very expensive jewels, together with the cheapest, fancy-colored feathers of European make, were arranged in her turban. Her tunic, reaching to a few inches above her knees, was decorated with gold coins. Her wrists were encircled with strings of gold beads; under her chin, reaching from ear to ear, was a heavy gold chain, upon which were strung many gold coins. Beads and gold coins hung around her neck.

Tea was being served continually. When it became late in the afternoon, I asked the "White Beard," whose name is Hamadamin, and who is the only male attendant admitted to the "Bride's Apartment," to ask Mosbahy Dwan if I could not have a room where I could rest. Putting his hand upon his eye with a profound lament, he left, returning in a few minutes to say: "Lady, command," (come or follow me). We passed through a beautiful room where Mosbahy Dwan was sitting, rapped up in furs like an invalid. He is a handsome man of forty; a great reader, a poet, a physician and a learned scholar.

My room was a pretty, simple one. Doves kept coming in and out of the upper windows. Stara (the maid) began to stroke me to put me to sleep. "Stara (sister), I am afraid you are very tired," I said.

"No, lady," she said, "it is a gift for me to make you comfortable. My arms are used to pleasant service."

In the morning I was waked by the sounds of drum and pipes. Lifting the heavy wadded curtain, I saw a magnificent semicircular group of men, women and children. Each had locke and interlocked her arms and fingers into the arms and fingers of the next neighbor. They were dancing a Kurdish dance.

Soon after breakfast, on a silver tray, brought by one of the bride's maids, I found a sweetmeat. "See, she said: "My mistress commanded me to present these unworthy presents to you." Then she said: "My mistress invites you to bring your presence to her apartment."

"Please give my salams to Nusir Hamid (bride's name) and say I will be glad to come."

In a further letter I will have more to tell of the bride and her wedding.

HOW CALIFORNIA ENTERTAINED THE LEAGUE

CALIFORNIA GIANT CACTI

FOLLOWING close upon the Great Convention, the army of Epworth Leavers is scattering itself throughout the broad and famous territory of California. Wh many of the visitors have been limited as to time, a model itinerary of short excursions has been arranged, which gives the strangers a complete idea of the beauties of Pacific Coast scenery. None, perhaps, is so full of interest as that of the Santa Clara Valley, the home of the olive and vine. Bayard Taylor proclaimed it "one of the three most beautiful valleys in the world." Extending in a southerly direction for a distance of sixty miles, with an average width of twenty, the valley is bounded on the west by the wooded mountains of Santa Cruz, and on the east by the famous Mt. Hamilton. From the suburbs of the city the kaleidoscopic haze of form and color began.

If Golden Gate looked mysterious and gray through the burning fog which draped the hills for twenty miles or more, then suddenly we moved out of it within view of the broad acres of peaches, pears, plums, cherries, apricots, prunes, almonds, and orange groves. The first stop was made at Palo Alto, the seat of Stanford University, where carriages were provided and the tourists, even through the grounds of the most richly endowed educational institution in the world, whose doors are open to both sexes. All of the buildings are in the Spanish style of architecture, forming a magnificent quadrangle, with ample shade from luxurious semi-tropical trees.

The tourists dined at the Hotel Vendome, and then began the ride over the smooth, graded road, built by Santa Clara County at an expense of $75,000, to the Lick Observatory on the summit of Mt. Hamilton, twenty-eight miles away. The body of the founder lies at the base of this dome, and immediately under the big telescope. Over 4,000 feet below, the Santa Clara spreads in all of its loveliness; to our left the rugged slopes of the Santa Cruz Range stand guard, the Bay of San Francisco on the right, dotted with spars and sails of every port. There is a view of Mt. Shasta, over 400 miles away, while to the right, far beyond, is the mighty West Sea.

THE FAMOUS LICK OBSERVATORY ON MT. HAMILTON

Next they visited Monterey, the "dream town" of the State. A stop at Del Monte, the "Queen of American Watering Places," with its acres of flowers, and its seven or eight conservatories, where the richest flowers bloom in profusion. The waters of the bay abound with mackerel, salt-water trout, salmon and rock cod, and of course the pleasures of the surf are an attraction; but most enjoyable to the Epworthians was the seventeen-mile drive along the most remarkable highway in the world.

THE SURF AT DEL MONTE

Just outside of Monterey is a wooden cross that marks the landing-place of the padre, Junipero Serra, the persevering Franciscan monk who founded the missions of California. He arrived in 1770 and established the Mission de San Carlos de Monterey. The following year, this mission was removed to the bank of the Carmel River, where it still stands. Religious services are still held in the old ruin, and the remains of Father Junipero Serra repose beneath its earthen floor. The drive took us through the Pacific Grove Retreat, or Christian Seaside Resort, two miles from Monterey. All around are old adobe tile-covered houses, many of them now are but picturesque ruins.

The road winds through a forest of redwoods and pine, with moss-hung branches and ivy-grown trunks. Here and there you catch glimpses of the sea and hear the noise of the surf pounding away on the shores. The glory of this drive, however, is the cypresses. They are odd and grotesque beyond all powers of description, and they are a perfectly distinct species. For thirty centuries they have withstood the storms which sometimes assail this extremity of the peninsula. Past Cypress Point the drive swings to the north, traverses forests and rocky headlands, brings Carmel Bay into view, reveals Pebble Beach, ascends through the forest to its crest, and descends again to Monterey, where we pass the old Custom House, which has played an important part in the early history of California. It is said that Spain built the first tower, Mexico the second, and Uncle Sam filled in between. But the most important event happened on July 18, 1846, when Commodore Sloat raised the Stars and Stripes on the flagstaff that still stands there to-day.

Collapse of the New Air-Ship

THE destruction of M. Santos-Dumont's air-ship in its dramatic trial trip made at Paris, on Aug. 8, has caused world-wide regret among people interested in aerial navigation. In spite of the untoward termination of this mid-air flight, it is plain that the young inventor has more nearly than any one before him successfully solved the problem of constructing a balloon which can be steered and controlled at will. The expedition ending so disastrously, was one of a number which M. Santos-Dumont has made to win the prize of $4,000 offered by M. Deutsch, to the first aeronaut who, in a single flight from St. Cloud, shall round the Eiffel Tower and alight at his starting point in thirty minutes. On July 13, his ship successfully rose from its perch at St. Cloud, soared above the Bois de Boulogne, and over Paris rounded the Eiffel Tower; but she failed to alight at St. Cloud, becoming unmanageable as the descent was about to be made. On Aug. 4, the ship made another journey over the Bois de Boulogne, turning obediently as a yacht answering her helm, for the return trip. In this case, the inventor did not seek to reach the Eiffel Tower, conditions being adverse. On Aug. 8, the balloon flew straight and fleet as a bird to the tower, rounded obediently, and was coming back when a strong wind striking her sideways, made her pitch and roll like a ship in a storm; the propeller struck the tower wires, which broke and deflation began. The aeronaut, perfectly cool, threw out ballast and sought to govern his descent, but down came the huge thing, striking the corner of a tall building and hanging there; and the inventor was rescued from a very dangerous position by means of ropes. The motor, M. Santos-Dumont says, is uninjured; that part worked all right; the rents in the balloon itself are to be repaired. Meanwhile, M. Deutsch, who watched the balloonist's peril, avers a desire to present the prize at once rather than to see him kill himself. M. Santos-Dumont, more concerned in solving the problem of aerial navigation than in winning the prize, will continue his experiments.

Catching a Thief in Africa

Rev. Erwin H. Richards, missionary at Inhambane, East Africa, writes: "Rendare (a native) came on Saturday evening, and with dreadful tears in her eyes and voice as well, declared how her best new pink Sunday dress (her only Sunday dress) was scissored beyond repair. Three months ago we had a similar ripping of new gowns, and suspicion lay heavily on Kanwinyi. Kanwinyi, at the same time, was found with stolen copper coins in her box. We had recently read of a ruse which worked well in another locality, and Mrs. Richards determined to use it in this case. The girls were all called, and each one was given a bit of splint from the broom. Remarks were made hinting that perhaps the one who drew the longest might prove the guilty party, but nothing was assured. Each girl, on drawing her splint, withdrew from the room at one door, passed through a hallway and entered at another, thus affording them opportunity to examine their straws privately. When they had all returned, it was found that Kanwinyi's splint was half an inch shorter than the others. Kanwinyi, knowing herself guilty, and feeling sure her stick was longer than any other, concluded to make matters safer by biting off half an inch, and in so doing convicted herself, for the sticks were all of the same length at first."

WOMAN'S EMPIRE

TEXT—Genesis 1: 27:
Male and female created he them

Other words, God, who can make no mistake, made man and woman for a specific work, and to move in particular spheres—man to be regnant in his realm, woman to be dominant in hers. The boundary line between Italy and Switzerland, between England and Scotland, is not more thoroughly marked than this distinction between the empire masculine and the empire feminine. So entirely dissimilar are the fields to which God called them, that you can no more compare them than you can oxygen and hydrogen, water and grass, trees and stars. All this talk about the superiority of one sex to the other sex is an everlasting waste of ink and speech. A jeweler may have a scale so delicate that he can weigh the dust of diamonds, but where are the scales so delicate that you can weigh in them affection against affection, sentiment against sentiment, thought against thought, soul against soul, a man's word against a woman's word?

You come out with your stereotyped remark, that man is superior to woman in intellect, and then I open on my desk the swarthy, iron-typed, thunder-bolted writings of Harriet Martineau, and Elizabeth Browning, and George Eliot. You come on with your stereotyped remark about woman's superiority to man in the item of affection, but I ask you where was there more capacity to love than in John the disciple, and Robert McCheyne, the Scotchman, and John Summerfield, the Methodist, and Henry Martyn, the missionary? The heart of those men was so large that after you had rolled into it the hemispheres, there was room still left to marshal the hosts of heaven, and set up the throne of the eternal Jehovah. I deny to man the throne intellectual. I deny to woman the throne affectional. No human phraseology will ever define the spheres, while there is an intuition by which we know when a man is in his realm, and when a woman is in her realm, and when either of them is out of it. No bungling legislature ought to attempt to make a definition, or to say, "This is the line, and that is the line."

Woman's Rights

My theory is, that if woman wants to vote, she ought to vote, and that if a man wants to embroider and keep house, he ought to be allowed to embroider and keep house. There are masculine women and there are effeminate men. My theory is, that you have no right to interfere with any one's doing anything that is righteous. Albany and Washington might as well decree by legislation how high a brown-thrasher should fly, or how deep a trout should plunge, as to try to seek out the height or the depth of woman's duty. The question of capacity will settle finally the whole question, the whole subject. When a woman is prepared to preach, she will preach, and neither Conference nor Presbytery can hinder her. When a woman is prepared to move in highest commercial spheres, she will have great influence on the Exchange, and no Boards of Trade can hinder her. I want woman to understand that heart and brain can overflow any barrier that politicians may set up, and that nothing can keep her back or keep her down but the question of capacity.

I know there are women of most undesirable nature, who wander up and down the country—having no homes of their own, or forsaking their own homes—talking about their rights; and we know very well that they themselves are fit neither to vote, nor fit to keep house. Their mission seems to be to humiliate the two sexes at the thought of what any one of us might become. No one would want to live under the laws that such women would enact, or to have cast upon society the children that such women would raise. But I will show you that the best rights that woman can own, she already has in her possession; that her position in this country at this time is not one of commiseration, but one of congratulation; that the grandeur and power of her realm have never yet been appreciated; that she sits to-day on a throne so high that all the thrones of earth piled on top of each other would not make for her a footstool. Here is the platform on which she stands. Away down below it are the ballot-box and the Congressional assemblage and the Legislative hall.

Woman always has voted and always will vote. Our great-grandfathers thought they were by their votes putting Washington into the presidential chair. No. His mother, by the principles she taught him, and by the habits she inculcated, made him President. It was a Christian mother's hand dropping the ballot when Lord Bacon wrote, and Newton philosophized, and Alfred the Great governed, and Jonathan Edwards thundered of judgment to come. How many men there have been in high political station, who would have been insufficient to stand the test to which their moral principle was put, had it not been for a wife's voice that encouraged them to do right, and a wife's prayer that sounded louder than the clamor of partisanship! Why, my friends, the right of suffrage, as we men exercise it, seems to be a feeble thing. You, a Christian man, come up to the ballot-box, and you drop your vote. Right after you comes a libertine or a sot—the offscouring of the street—and he drops his vote; and his vote counteracts yours. But if in the quiet of home life a daughter by her Christian demeanor, a wife by her industry, a mother by her faithfulness, casts a vote in the right direction, then nothing can resist it, and the influence of that vote will throb through the eternities.

Supreme in the Home

My chief anxiety then is, not that woman have other rights accorded her, but that she, by the grace of God, rise up to the appreciation of the glorious rights she already possesses. I shall only have time to speak of one grand and all-absorbing right that every woman has, and that is to make home happy. That realm no one has ever disputed with her. Men may come home at noon or at night, and they tarry a comparatively little while; but she, all day long, governs it, beautifies it, sanctifies it. It is within her power to make it the most attractive place on earth. It is the only calm harbor in this world. You know as well as I do, that this outside world and the business world is a long scene of jostle and contention. The man who has a dollar struggles to keep it; the man who has it not struggles to get it. Prices up. Prices down. Losses. Gains. Misrepresentations. Gougings. Underselling. Buyers depreciating; salesmen exaggerating. Tenants seeking less rent; landlords demanding more. Gold fidgety. Struggles about office. Men who are in trying to keep in; men out trying to get in. Slips, tumbles. Defalcations. Panics. Catastrophes. O woman! Thank God you have a home, and that you may be queen in it. Better be there than wear a queen's coronet. Better be there than carry the purse of a princess. Your abode may be humble, but you can by your faith in God, and your cheerfulness of demeanor, gild it with splendors such as an upholsterer's hand never yet kindled. There are abodes in the city—humble, two stories, four plain unpapered rooms; undesirable neighborhood; and yet there is a man here to-day who would die on the threshold rather than surrender it. Why? It is home. Whenever he thinks of it, he sees angels of God hovering around it. The ladders of heaven are let down to this house. Over the child's rough crib there are the chantings of angels, as those that sounded over Bethlehem. It is home. These children may come up after awhile, and they may win high position, and they may have an affluent residence; but they will not until their dying day forget that humble roof, under which their father rested, and their mother sang, and their sisters played. Oh, if you would gather up all tender memories, all the lights and shades of the heart, all banquetings and reunions, all filial, fraternal, paternal, and conjugal affections, and you had only just four letters to spell out that height and depth and length and breadth and magnitude and eternity of meaning, you would, with streaming eyes, and trembling voice, and agitated hand, write it out in those four living capitals, H-O-M-E.

An Inalienable Dominion

What right does woman want that is grander than to be queen in such a realm? Why, the eagles of heaven cannot fly across that dominion. Horses, panting and with lathered flanks, are not swift enough to run to the outpost of that realm. They say that the sun never sets upon the English Empire; but I have to tell you that on this realm of woman's influence, eternity never marks any bound. Isabella fled from the Spanish throne, pursued by the nation's anathema; but she who is queen in a home will never lose her throne, and death itself will only be the annexation of heavenly principalities.

When you want to get your grandest idea of a queen, you do not think of Catharine of Russia, or of Anne of England, or Maria Theresa of Germany; but when you want to get your grandest idea of a queen, you think of the plain woman who sat opposite your father at the table, or walked with him arm-in-arm down life's pathway, sometimes to the thanksgiving banquet, sometimes to the grave, but always together—soothing your petty griefs, correcting your childish waywardness, joining in your infantile sports, listening to your evening prayers, toiling for you with needle, or at the spinning-wheel, and on cold nights wrapping you up snug and warm. And then, at last, on that day when she lay in the back room dying, and you saw her take those thin hands with which she toiled for you so long, and put them together in a dying prayer that commended you to God whom she had taught you to trust—O, she was the queen! The chariots of God came down to her; and as she went in, all heaven rose up. You not think of her now without a rush of tenderness stirs the deep foundations of your soul, and you find much a child again as when you cried on her lap; you could bring her back again to speak just once your name as tenderly as she used to speak it; you would be willing to throw yourself on the ground and kiss the sod that covers her, crying: "Mother! mother! Ah! she was the queen—she was the queen."

Now, can you tell me how many thousand men a woman like that would have to travel down before she got to the ballot-box? Compared with this world of training kings and queens for God and eternity, how significant seems all this work of voting for aldermen and common councilmen, and sheriffs, and constables, and mayors, and presidents. To make as I have tried to describe, how many thousand men you want of those people who go in the round of gossamer, and fashion, and dissipation, distorting their bodies and going as far toward disgraceful apparel as they dare go, so as not to be arrested of the police—behavior a sorrow to the good, and a caricature of the vicious, and an insult to that God who made women and not gorgons; and tramping on, through a frivolous and dissipated life, to temporal and eternal destruction. O woman, with the lightning of your soul, strike dead at your feet all these allurements to dissipation and to fashion. Your immortal soul cannot be fed upon such garbage. God calls you to empire and dominion. Will you have it? O, give to God all your culture; give to God all your refinement; give yourself to him, for this world and the next. All these bright eyes will be quenched, and these will be hushed. For the last time you will look this fair earth, father's hand, mother's hand, sister's hand, child's hand, will be no more in yours. It is night, and there will come up a cold wind from Jordan, and you must start. Will it be a lone woman on a trackless moor? Ah! no, Jesus will come that hour and offer his hand.

A Dream of Heaven

One twilight, after I had been playing with the children for some time, I laid down on the lounge to rest, and, half asleep and half awake, I seemed to be in this dream: It seemed to me that I was in a far country—land—not Persia, although more than oriental luxuriance crowned the cities; nor the tropics, although more than tropical fruitfulness filled the gardens; nor Italy, although more than Italian softness filled the air, and I wandered around, looking for thorns and nettles, but I found none of them grew there. And I walked and I saw the sun rise, and I said: "When will it set again?" and the sun sank not. And I saw all the people in holiday apparel, and I said: "When will they put on workingman's garb again, and delve in the mine, and swelter at the forge?" But neither the garments nor the robes did they put off. And I wandered in the suburbs, and I said: "Where do they bury the dead of this great city?" And I looked along by the hills where it would be most beautiful for the dead to sleep, and I saw castles, and towers, and battlements; but I saw no mausoleum, nor monument, nor white slab could see. And I went into the great chapel of the town, and I said: "Where do the poor worship? Where are the benches on which they sit?" And a voice answered: "We have no poor in this great city." And I wandered out, seeking to find the place where were the hovels of the destitute; and I found mansions of amber and ivory, and gold, but no tear did I see, or sigh hear. I was bewildered; and I sat under the shade of a great tree, and I said: "What am I, and whence comes all this?" And at that moment there came among the leaves, skipping up the flowery path and across the sparkling waters, a very bright and sparkling group; and when I saw their step I knew it, and when I heard their voices I thought I knew them, for their apparel was so different from anything I have ever seen, I bowed, a stranger to strangers. But a while, when they clapped their hands, and shed, "Welcome! Welcome!" the mystery was solved, and I saw that time had passed, and that eternity had come, and that God had gathered us up into a higher realm, and I said: "Are all here?" and the voices of innumerable generations answered: "All here." And while the gladness were raining down our cheeks, and the branches of the Lebanon cedars were clapping their hands, and the towers of the great city were cheering their welcome, we began to laugh, and sing, and shout: "Home! Home! Home!"

DROUGHT PROLONGS CHINA'S FAMINE

Late Letters not Encouraging --- Another $20,000 Sent to the Relief Committee

LETTERS received during the past week by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bring discouraging news regarding the famine outlook. Mr. Erik Folke, of the Swedish Mission to China, writes from the mission headquarters in Stockholm, under date July 19:

"In a letter recently received from China there are two statements of interest, viz.: On May 16, Chang, one of our evangelists, sent the following telegram to the coast from Liaw, Shensi: 'As yet no rain has fallen.' In a letter of March 22d, he says: 'If I don't get rain in the third moon, the famine will say that the escort from Shansi was expected in Peking on the 4th June. Probably two or three missionaries of other missions will accompany the party. I am sure you will pray yourself, and get as much prayer as possible for these friends on their difficult mission. The news that we have from the native Christians in Shansi is that they are in great distress, on account of the famine and the afflictions and persecutions they endured last year. We cannot but believe that, after all this time of suffering, God is going to give special blessing. We trust that much prayer will be elicited from the friends in the home lands. You will be glad to hear

Chinese and in their own languages. He tells of money received from England and Sweden for the famine-suffering native Christians of Shansi and Shensi, and how they appreciate any little help they receive from the Christians of other lands. Some of this money was sent with the native evangelist Chsui, and the courageous Ting, who with difficulty succeeded in saving the last three missionaries from Shansi, who arrived at the coast only in February last. Ting had been converted through the efforts of the missionary, Mr. Kay, who suffered a martyr's death at Kii-u station.

terrible.' Note that the day on which he sent his telegram was the 28th of the third moon. This is a sad news. May the Lord prosper you in your efforts to allay these terrible sufferings."

In a letter from Mr. J. W. Stevenson, Deputy Director of the China Inland Mission, dated at Shanghai, June 8, Mr. Tjader, of the Undenomination Gospel Mission, New York City, the writer says:

"Your brother, who has gone to Peking with Messrs. Orr-Ewing and Ernest Taylor, left on June 2, promised to write you a line. They are hoping, D.V., to start from Peking shortly, for Shansi. I was very glad to receive a letter last night from Mr. Richard, to that many of our stations in the central provinces are re-occupied, and the missionaries are finding open doors for preaching the Gospel."

Mr. Tjader adds this extract from a letter received from his brother:

"Just after the receipt of the foregoing letter, a missionary staying at Kuling, near Kinkiang, on the Yangtsekiang River, in the Province of Kiangsi, writes that at that station, which lies some 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, many missionaries are now waiting the time for their return to their inland stations. There are missionaries of several nationalities having meetings for mutual help and encouragement every day, in interior of the Province of Shansi says, concerning the famine there: 'Unless rain falls before the end of the third month (corresponding with our April-May) the horrors of this famine will be without limit; but, sad to say, this rain has not fallen, and the distress, particularly of the native Christians, is growing with every day.'

Another remittance of $20,000 has been cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the Famine Relief Committee at Tientsin through the Hong-Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. It is probable that the Missionary Committee, in view of urgent appeals, will devote the greater part of this sum to relief work in Shensi and Shansi.

GRATEFUL WORDS FROM ARMENIA

READERS of this paper, who helped in the good work for Armenia in her time of massacre and trouble, and who afterward aided in caring for the orphans, left as the heritage of that season of tears and bloodshed, have a right to share with us the pleasure of reading such letters as follow. Inasmuch as they show the blessings wrought by our common love. This, dated June 22, 1901, is from Miss Anna Shattuck, well known to our readers as the heroine of Oorfa:

"DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: We have received, with hearts full of gratitude, the sum of $250, being the twelfth and final quarterly remittance of $3,000, pledged by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD toward the support of our work at the office of the Armenian Relief operations of 1897. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD people! Relief aid kept people alive. The $3,000 for orphan support and education will, by God's continued blessing, build up the Armenian community, men of Christian principle and thrift. The help has been of inestimable value. We tremble, now it has come to an end.

"The slow process of character-moulding and training is being continued. Our oldest boys are only just beginning to be turned out of the nest. Some of the younger ones are eagerly stretching their wings (the eagerness is strongest) and some scarce know they are flying."

From Harpoot, Rev. H. N. Barnum wrote, July 3d: "DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: Your favors of the 24th and 16th, containing remittances for $40 for Mrs. Barnum's work and $150 for the orphans we support in Harpoot, reached us by last mail. Please accept our sincere thanks. The agency of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in helping to relieve the woes of the world is one of the marvels of modern philanthropy. The $1,800 which you have sent us during the last three years to Harpoot, has provided for the support of twenty-four of our more than 1,000 orphans. It has not simply given food and clothing, but it has provided for their tuition, and it has given those who are large enough to work the beginnings of an industrial education. As you know, our chief concern is to give them such training as shall develop the mind and the body, and fit them to care for themselves and to become worthy members of society. We greatly desire to teach them useful trades and improved agricultural methods, but the difficulties are many. Modern inventions find little encouragement in the interior of Turkey. We need an enterprising young man to superintend such a department, for although truly missionary labor, it is somewhat outside of our evangelistic work, which is already greater than we can well manage. We also need special funds for the development of this department."

In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, letters from the other missionaries in Armenia were published, acknowledging, in grateful terms, the payments of final installments for their orphan work.

A SONG OF GRACE

WHAT have I in this world so fair
But oppression grim to bear;
Foes assail me day and night,
Often wound me in the fight,
Healer of the stricken soul,
Hasten thou to make me whole,
Then I'll sing of saving blood,
Till I've passed through death's dark flood.

Oh, that I could walk away
With my God from day to day,
Spend each moment in the light
Of his countenance so bright;
Jesus, let me see thy face,
Full of tenderness and grace,
Then I'll sing of saving blood,
Till I've passed through death's dark flood.

*This translation of the famous Welsh hymn, "Beth Cydd i mi yn y byd," by Morgan Rhys, was made for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. D. J. Llewellyn, of Abercorn, Wales.

Joseph Cook

NOTWITHSTANDING all that this journal has said in editorial and reportorial column during weeks past, concerning the life and death of that most distinguished Christian scientist, Joseph Cook, we feel that two or three other things need to be written.

There were some who did not fully appreciate him. The fact is that he sacrificed his nervous system in the cause of God and humanity. If on the field of battle a soldier lose arm or eye or foot, we take off our hat and bow down with reverence before the patriotic sufferer. Why not have as much reverential appreciation for one who, in the cause of truth and righteousness, puts his nervous system on the altar. Are not the nerves of one's entire body of as much importance as an eye or a limb? The amount of study that Joseph Cook endured amid foreign universities before he began his important work in this country, can never be estimated. After he began that unequalled work of showing, as no man ever did, that science and religion are in harmony, and that the God of the rocks is the God of the Bible, he endured a mental and nervous strain that was simply appalling.

The occasional ebullitions of feeling that were somewhat conspicuous, were the result of overwork, and in no wise were set down against him by generous souls. Although his work practically ended two years before his death, he had accomplished as much for intelligent Christianity as ought to be expected of any twenty writers and speakers. He was as much a martyr as Ridley or Latimer. All up and down the earth he had sounded the harmonies of natural and revealed religion. Asking me at Madison, South Dakota, the year upon which he made his tour through Australia and India, as to what I thought of the undertaking, I encouraged him to go, and prophesied for him great success; but alas, the fatigues of travel, and the sudden climatic changes, added to his toils on platforms and in pulpits, were too much for him, and he came back with an invalidism that could not be alleviated. His monument ought to adorn the entrance of every theological seminary in Christendom, as his influence will abide while the earth stands. He was the best answer that I know of to the theory abroad in some places that our holy religion is good for children under six years of age and women over eighty, but not appropriate for strong-minded people. What a gigantic intellect he had, and how gloriously it was consecrated to the promulgation of the religion of the Bible.

The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails well fastened are the words of the masters of assemblies. Ec. 12: 11.

Stagnation or Sensationalism

AS far as we can understand, it seems to be a war between them, and we dislike both. We do not know which word is the worst. It is a national habit in literature and religion to call that sensationalism which we ourselves cannot do. If an author write a book that will not sell, he is apt to charge the books of the day which do succeed as being sensational. There are a great many men who, in the world and the Church, are dead failures, who spend their time in letting the public know that they are not sensationalists. The fact is that they never made any stir while living, nor will they in dying, save as they rob the undertaker of his fees, they not leaving enough to pay their dismission expenses.

We hate sensationalism in the pulpit, so far as that word means the preaching of everything but the Gospel; but the simple fact is that whenever and wherever faith and repentance are proclaimed with emphasis, there will be a sensation. The people in our great cities are hungry for the old Gospel of Christ. If our young men in the ministry want large audiences, let them quit philosophizing, and hair-splitting, and botanizing, and without gloves take hold of men's sins and troubles, and there will be no lack of hearers. Stagnation is worse than sensationalism.

We have always noticed, that just in proportion as a man cannot get along himself, he is fearful of someone else making an excitement. Last week a mud-turtle down by the brook opened its shell and discoursed to a horse that was coming down to drink. The mud-turtle said to the horse: "Just as I get sound asleep, you are sure to come past and wake me up. We always used to have a good quiet time down here in the swamp till you got in the habit of thumping along this way. I am conservative and like to keep in my shell. I have been pastor of thirteen other mud-turtles, and we always had peace till you came, and next week at our semi-annual meeting of mud-turtles, we shall either have you voted a nuisance, or will talk it over in private, eight or ten of us, which will probably be the more prudent way." Then the mud-turtle shell went shut with a snap, at which the horse kicked up his heels as he turned to go up to the barn to be harnessed to a load of corn that was ready for the market.

Let us all wake up and go to work. There are in the private membership of our churches, and in the ministry, a great many men who are dead, but have never had the common decency to get buried. With the harvest white and "lodging" for lack of a sickle, instead of lying under the trees criticizing the sweating reapers who are at work, let us throw off our own coat and go out to see how good a swath we can cut.

These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also. Acts 17: 6.

The Coming Generations

THERE are many about us in boyhood and girlhood in comfortable circles that are going to be something very good or very bad, very bright or very ignorant; and they will yet make their parents glad with an infinite gladness or pain them with an infinite sorrow. They go bounding through the hall; they shout in the yard; they sing in the school. This activity, that now strikes the ball, and runs the race, and rolls the hoop, and flies the kite, will soon be ready for the higher game of life, where fortunes are to be made, and reputations achieved, and temptations combated, and immortal souls jeopardized and kingdoms of glory won.

Call up that child; push back his hair. Shall this face be ever brightening up with benevolence, or scarred and pinched and blasted with low excesses? Shall those eyes become more and more intelligent, or shall they acquire the dishonest glare and the servile downcast? Put your hand on that child's heart. Shall it always beat with noble impulses, or will it be a thief's heart, a coward's heart, a traitor's heart?

I have so much faith in the advancement of our race under the Gospel, that I suppose the rising generations are to have in their number more noble men than their predecessors. I suppose that every day we are walking unconsciously among Enochs, and Augustines, and Wilberforces, and Clarksons, and Moffats, and Robert Halls. There they are—on the back seat in the mission school! There they are—playing marbles in the low alley, their knees out, their elbows out, their toes out, their hats rimless, and their souls Christless; and in double columns there is printed on their countenance a tragedy of unutterable pain! But they shall be gathered in. Sabbath Schools will do their work. Tract and Bible societies will do their work. A Christian printing-press will do its work. And they who are now scoffed at as ragamuffins will pass on to be the men of might and the men of God in future years.

Stand back, and let them pass on—the long procession of Christians, and philanthropists, and heroes, and reformers, and statesmen, and let our prayers go with them, and all Christian influences attend them, long after we have unbuckled the sword of the conflict and gone home to rest!

Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth. Psalms 45: 16.

The Pistol Business

HARDLY a newspaper is opened that does not reveal some crime or accident by pistol. They did not know it was loaded; or it fell off a shelf and the fatal wound was given; or in outburst of temper, two men quarreling, a life was destroyed. What business have you with a pistol in a civilized neighborhood, and well protected by the law, and called to no official service in exposed places? What a coward you must be! Throw away your pistol where no one will find it. Some member of your family will yet be shot by it if you do not look out. Some of us have traveled far and near, and for a good many years, and have never been in any place, or amid any circumstances, where we needed deadly weapons. A pistol in time of is murder on the shelf or in the bureau. Let the sheriff making an arrest, or a policeman walking the streets at midnight, or officer trying to quell a riot fully armed, but an ordinary home in ordinary circumstances needs no firearms.

The weapons of our warfare are not carnal. II. Cor. 10: 4.

Answer Not Again

NO useful people escape being barked at. Monology represents Cerberus, a monster dog, the mouth of hell; but he has had a long line of pupils. They start out at editors, teachers, philanthropists and Christians. If these men go right on their way and perform their mission and get their reward, but one-half of them stop and make attempt to silence the literary, political, and ecclesiastical curs that snap at them. Many an author has got a drop of printers' ink splattered in his eye, and collapsed. The critic who had lobsters for supper the night before, and whose wife in the morning had parted his hair on the wrong side, snarled at the new book, and the time that the author might have spent in new work he squandered in gunning for critics. You might better have one straight ahead. You will come to be estimated exactly what you are worth. If a fool, no amount of newspaper or magazine puffery can set you up; if you are useful, no amount of newspaper or magazine detraction can keep you down. For every position there are twenty aspirants; only one man can fit; forthwith the other nineteen are on the offensive. People are silly enough to think that they can build themselves up with the bricks they pull out of you, and pass on and leave them. What a waste of powder for a hunter to go into the woods to shoot black flies, or for a man of great work to notice infinitesimal assaults!

Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou be like unto him. Proverbs 26: 4.

Sweet and Sour

IN some lives the saccharine seems to predominate. Life in sunshine on a bank of flowers. A throng of hands to clap approval. In December or in January, looking across their table, they see all their family present. Health rubicund. Skies flamboyant. Delicacies resilient. But in a great many cases there are too many sugars as acids. The annoyances, and the vexations, and the disappointments of life overpower the successes. There is a gravel in almost every shoe. An Arabian legends says that there was a worm in Solomon's staff, gnawing its strength away; and there is a weak spot in every earthly support that a man leans on. King George of England forgot all the grandeur of his throne because, one day in an interview, Jean Brummell called him by his first name, and addressed him as a servant, crying: "George, ring the bell!" Miss Langdon, honored all the world over for her poetic genius, is so worried with the evil reports set forth regarding her, that she is found dead, with an empty bottle of prussic acid in her hand. Goldsmith said that his life was a wretched being, and that all that want and contempt could bring to it had been brought; and cries out: "What, then, is there formidable in a life?" Gorgeggio's fine painting is hung up for a tavern sign. Hogarth cannot sell his best paintings except through a raffle. Andrew Delsart makes the great fresco of the Church of the Annunciata, at Florence, and gets for pay a sack of corn; and there are annoyances and vexations in high places as well as in low places, showing that in great many lives the sour is greater than the sweet.

It is absurd to suppose that a man who has rays been well can sympathize with those who are sick; or that one who has always been honored can appreciate the sorrow of those who are despised; or that one who has been born to a great fortune can understand the distress and the straits of those who are destitute. The fact that Christ himself took the vinegar makes him able to sympathize to-day and forever with all those whose cup is filled with sharp acids of this life.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Dead Empress

HEROIC to the last, the brave woman who had suffered so much of physical pain and mental anguish during her life of imperial splendor, has passed away. Surviving her beloved mother, Queen Victoria, by only a few months, the Empress Frederick died on August 5, at her summer retreat at Cronberg. Like her illustrious husband, she was a victim of cancer. She had suffered long, and during the last few weeks it was seen that the end was near at hand. Her brother, the King of England, had been ready to start on a visit to her, but the telegram announcing the crisis in her disease was followed so closely by that conveying the intelligence of her death, that he was unable to be present. Her son, the Emperor William, was at her bedside, with her favorite sister, the Princess Helena, now the Princess Christian, and other relatives and friends. She was a little more than sixty years of age. Forty-three years ago, she left her English home to be the bride of the young Prince, Frederick, of Prussia, who had made an earnest plea that, in spite of her youth, the marriage should not be delayed. The royal couple were devoted to one another, and, all the more so, as the tide of unpopularity, which Bismarck maliciously fanned, beat upon the union. The great statesman formed the opinion that the young Princess, whose exceptional ability he recognized, would imbue their to the throne with the constitutional principles which had shorn English royalty of much of its power. Hissed her with the coarsest language of which he was master, and openly and privately insulted her. The devoted woman, however, performed her duties with so much tact and grace that friends rallied to her side, and her husband's fidelity was a refuge for her from the curi-osity of Bismarck and his followers. During the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, the Princess's exertions in aid of the wounded German soldiers and for the comfort of the army under her husband's command, commended her still more to the German people and won their confidence and esteem. During her husband's illness, her devotion to him was exemplary, and when, after a brief respite of only one hundred days, he died there was general sympathy for her throughout her adopted country. Bismarck's malignity had known no decrease even in her bitter troubles, when a man with the instincts of a German would have shown some conciliation. His spite fell from her, however, relieved her of his persecution, and of late years her life was passed tranquilly in works of beneficence. Until the dread malady developed, which has now proved fatal, she took a deep interest in all projects of philanthropy, and sought in many ways to benefit the poor and afflicted in her son's empire. She was buried by her own desire in the Church of Peace, at Potsdam, at the side of her illustrious husband, whom she had loved with devotedness.

"I heart of her husband doth safely trust in her. She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She stretcheth out her hands to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy" (Ps. 31: 11, 12, 20).

The Schley Investigation

Is gratifying to the public that the long and acrimonious dispute between the friends of Admiral Sampson and those of Admiral Schley is at last to be submitted to a properly constituted court. Admiral Schley has asked for the appointment of the court and his request has been granted. The chief accusations against him are three. One charge is that when it was desired to intercept the Spanish fleet, and he was instructed to find out its refuge, he remained outside the harbor of Cienfuegos, without ascertaining whether the Spanish fleet was inside. In answer to this charge, it is replied that he was unable to ascertain whether the fleet was there, because he had not been intrusted with the code of signals with which the insurgents on shore were trying to communicate with the American fleet. A second charge is, that when Schley arrived at Santiago, he did not establish a proper blockade. In reply, he pleads that his coal supply was inadequate, and this question will have to be settled by reference to the logs of the vessels. A third charge is, that when the Spanish ships emerged from the harbor of Santiago and it was necessary to execute a turning maneuver, he turned his vessel to the right, away from the enemy, while the other vessels turned to the left, toward the enemy, and that Schley, in choosing that course, embarrassed the other elevate the forepart of its body. The head swayed gently from side to side, the black forked tongue was thrust in and out of its mouth, and its eyes were fixed steadily on her own. She knew that she was in imminent danger, but when she attempted to rise and run away her limbs would not obey her. She was perfectly helpless. She sat still, completely fascinated and unable to take her eyes from the glittering eyes of the snake. Her body was becoming benumbed, and her eyes were closing when the rattle of a team and wagon struck her ear. In a few minutes it was driven up, her spell was broken, and the snake made off to the woods. She was taken up into the wagon and driven to her home. Since then she has been in a condition of nervous prostration and has been under medical treatment since the occurrence. It was well for her that the team came along at that time, otherwise the consequences might have been still more serious. It is remarkable that some forms of sin, to which the serpent is compared in the Bible, seem to have the same power of paralyzing the victim, so that even when he is anxious to shake them off he cannot:

To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not (Rom. 7: 18).

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan is scheduled to spend about three weeks in Chicago and vicinity in November. He will lecture each morning at the Moody Institute on "The Crises of the Christ," a series of studies in the life of Christ. Evening services will be held in different sections of the city. Fuller information can be obtained by writing to R. A. Torrey, General Superintendent, 80 Institute Place, Chicago.

The Presbyterian General Assembly of New South Wales asked the General Australian Assembly to appoint an influential committee to devise a scheme for the federation of as many as possible of the churches of the commonwealth, with power to confer with the representatives of churches of other denominations, so as to promote closer fellowship and organized co-operation, "with a view to the formation of one grand Church for Australia."

Friends of Dr. W. P. George in the East will be glad to learn that his work in Kansas City, Mo., is being greatly blessed of God. At the recent celebration of the Congregational Church of which he is pastor, it was announced that the membership had increased to 455, in spite of deaths and removals. The number of new members received on confession of faith was 108. During the year the contributions of the Church for all purposes had exceeded $70,000.

vessels of the American fleet. These charges do not imply disloyalty or cowardice, but dilatoriness and incapacity. The fact of his asking for an investigation appears to indicate that he has a valid defence for his conduct. It will be gratifying to Admiral Schley, as it will be to the whole people, who are concerned in the honor of the service, if the court should vindicate him from the charges brought against him. He has now the opportunity for which many a man, like the ancient patriarch, has longed.

Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know my integrity (Job 31: 6).

Hypnotized by a Snake

The current belief in the power of a snake to charm a human being received confirmation a few days ago in a small village in Pennsylvania. A young lady visiting in the neighborhood, while walking from one town to another, passed through the village in question. Becoming tired, she sat down on a rock to rest. In a few minutes she saw, to her horror, a large snake glide down from a bank opposite to her, and advancing to within six feet of the rock on which she sat, coil itself and

THE GATEWAY TO THE LAND OF GOLD

By... F. M. SHEPARD

A FOOT AND BY PACK ON CORDUROY ROAD

FIRST PATH ON THE SKAGWAY

WHEN THE STEAM CARS CAME

TRAVELING recently from Dawson to New York, I had good reason to appreciate the contrast between the earlier stages of the journey as we make it now and as we had to make it a few years ago. The illustration on the first page of this paper, is the reproduction of a photograph taken before the White Pass Railroad was built; it pictures ground as historic as the ice-fields of Russia, over which Napoleon's army went to its doom; and it will recall memories at once strenuous, tragic and humorous to every living Klondiker who climbed, or tried to climb, the Scales of Chilkoot Pass. By pack we used to go from Dyea in stages to Finigan's Point, then to the mouth of the Canyon, again to Sheep Camp and Stone House; and then the Scales, up which, at an angle of nearly 45 degrees, we toiled with fifty pounds apiece of baggage strapped on our backs; a man with an outfit of a 1,000 pounds had to make many trips. I carried my own burden to the summit, and I know. The little dots show our resting spots. Overhead, you see the cables, by means of which baggage of affluent pilgrims underwent transportation.

The whole journey from Skagway to Dawson is a pleasure trip. There are as yet only 111 miles of railway in Alaska and the Yukon, but what a change has been wrought through their agency! The corduroy road, miles and miles of which were built over marshy places on the Skagway and the Dyea trail before the steam road came, was our first advance towards civilized means of transit. The photographs showing scenes along the way of construction of the White Pass Railroad, mark that stage of our progress which opened the gateway of the Yukon to those who could not, or would not take their lives in their hands to reach it. It has not increased the number of those who seek our northern Eldorado—for the gold fever has subsided—but it may be said to have affected the character of the army of invasion, for gentler people come since easier ways of travel have been provided. A factor which has had an important share in the remarkable development of Dawson's moral and social tone, for instance, is the introduction there of women and children. Men are bringing their families out.

In June, when the Northern Transportation Company gave an outing to the children of Dawson, 400 little folks, chiefly Sunday School Scholars in charge of their teachers, went up the Yukon on the steamer provided; and a fine time they had at the Indian settlement at Moosehide, where the Red Men danced a war dance for their entertainment. Two years ago, in a congregation of 200, at the Methodist Church here, there were but seven or eight women to be seen. Now, in our sacred and social gatherings, ladies predominate. One of our illustrations shows what was a very interesting function—the first wedding in this church. The pastor, Rev. Mr. A. E. Hetherington, was the groom. The officiating clergymen were Rev. James Turner, first pastor of the church, assisted by Rev. Dr. Grant, of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church. The relations between the denominations are very friendly. The Presbyterians have a good hospital here, and the Methodists maintain a ward in it. It is well supported and has enough work to do; but since our drainage system was improved, Dawson is a healthy town, and there is nothing here now like the terrible malarial sickness which afflicted this place in common with other mining camps.

Our churches are all doing good work, but you cannot see accumulating results here as elsewhere, for a congregation one year is never what it was the year before, owing to the fluctuations of our population; townspeople go out on the creeks to work claims, and people from the outside world come in, and strange faces continually confront the pastor. At certain seasons of the year, a church may gain twenty members one week and lose fifty the next. Hence, pastoral work here is surely sowing good seed broadcast. The Methodists are now sending a missionary into the mining camps; and meetings are being held on the creeks, with twenty to fifty miners, miners' wives and children as the average gathering.

LAYING THE RAILS IN THE NEW COUNTRY

CLIMBING DIZZY HEIGHTS

ROCK WORKERS ON TUNNEL MOUNT.

The Salvation Army is doing excellent work in the town and holding rallies on the creeks.

Dawson, which a few years ago held its own in point of general wickedness, as well as bad sanitation, against any other mining camp, is now one of the cleanest, healthiest and most moral of towns to which the term "mining camp" can in any sense be applied. Regulations which went into effect June 1, cleared the place completely of gamblers and gambling dens. Dance-halls and worse places of infamy stood a like fate. Objectionable women, driven across the river to Klondike City, must leave that place soon. The women who closed our gambling dens, a number of professional gamblers took the next boat for Nome, where it is to be desired that measures as drastic as those at Dawson may be applied to them. There is not as much drunkenness in Dawson on the creeks as might be supposed. I have not seen a drunken man in Dawson for a year and a half. When vice comes here, it must hide its head. We have the best police system in the world for a new mining district. The North Star Mounted Police, as a semi-military organization, play no part in politics, executes justice without fear or favor and has become famous for the way in which it has brought law and order out of chaos. Among the attractions of our town, and one that exercises an influence on its moral and intellectual life, is the fine Public Library and Free Reading Room, representing a work which was begun by the ladies of Dawson, and afterwards liberally assisted by the local government. The new Post Office and the Court House are among the finest to be found in any city of the same size in Canada.

It is difficult for the Eastern mind to conceive of pictures by the midnight sun. But on Midnight Dome, near Dawson, we have held many Sunday School entertainments at midnight; and it is quite the custom to have social functions on Midnight Dome at this witching hour. Once, in the light of the midnight sun, I saw the Stars and Stripes run up on the Dome. In Dawson, on the Fourth of July, a year ago the Union Jack went up, and then "Old Glory," and the two flags floated peacefully side by side in the light of the midnight sun. If Canada owns the Territory of the Yukon, the United States owns the only gateway to this land of gold, and surely there should always be found ways of so doing happily, in the interest of both governments, all problems that may chance to present themselves.

Occupations for Women

I. — THE REAL ESTATE AGENT

FEW women as yet have deliberately taken up the business of managing real estate, buying and selling houses and land, and renting property. Occasionally a clever woman drifts into this avocation, and makes a success of her efforts. Not long ago I talked with a bright-eyed, clear-brained, decisive young woman who had adopted this line as her profession, succeeding to business built up by her father.

"No," she said, in answer to a question, "I did not go to my work without training. When I left school, I did not want to stay at home and do nothing; I had a strong desire to earn my bread, just as my brothers did. I took a thorough course in bookkeeping, and then entered my father's office to keep his books. After awhile I began to collect rents and to see to repairs. Gradually, more and more of the responsibility fell upon me, and I found myself able to do whatever a man in the same position would undertake. I have studied investments, and have learned the relative probabilities of neighborhoods; which one will be likely to grow in value and importance, and which is going backward. I have a woman architect associated with me, and we are giving much consideration to the subject of model tenements."

"You do not feel that your business is unfeminine?"

"Certainly it is as proper for a woman to manage homes and new settlements, if she can, as to make dresses and bonnets, and it gives her much wider scope for her talents, and opportunities in the outdoor life are excellent for her health. Unfeminine? Nothing is more feminine which is clean, wholesome, and honest all through. The only thing that I should be ashamed of, would be, being a poor real estate agent. So long as I do the thing well, I am content and happy."

Architecture, which naturally makes in the same company with farming, house building and home renting and selling, is a profession sought by many women. At Pratt Institute in Brooklyn, atrexel in Philadelphia, at Armour Institute in Chicago, and at many of the Western universities courses in architecture are taught and popular. Severe study is required, but the young woman who would become an architect pledges herself to this, and finds it fascinating. Once graduated, the girl can easily find employment in the offices of established architects, and the salaries paid are much higher than in many other lines of work.

Women are wise in seeking and choosing new fields of labor, and in avoiding the beaten tracks. The woman who can take the initiative in something novel, who has courage, ambition, and perseverance in what she undertakes will never make a failure.

Snubbing Children

Snubbing children is very nearly as wicked as nagging men, and I hold that the latter habit is an unspeakable vice. The ultra fastidious person, seeing little Sally hold her fork or spoon awkwardly, cannot let the child eat her dinner in peace. She sees before her a tremendous vista of dinners in days to come, when the grown-up Sally will hold her spoon as the infant does, and she simply cannot let her alone. To this day, a graying woman recalls and resents the reproof of a lady who said, "You should not say you love strawberries; you love your mother; you only like strawberries." It was not true; she still loves strawberries, and always has, and it was mean to nag her.

Snubbing is even more barbarous. "Gerald will keep the grass in order," says Gerald's mother. "I pity the person who depends on Gerald," says the snubbing Cousin Jane. "Molly will see to the flowers for the table," avers grandmother. "Humph!" ejaculates the snubbing Miss Belle, who never sees any good thing in seven-year-old Molly. A person who has the habit of snubbing boys and girls, little dreams of the hurts thus inflicted on sensitive natures. Especially the boy, big, growing fast, stretching toward manhood, is at the mercy of older young men, who seem to think snubbing a needful discipline for the junior, and who are mistaken.

Old-Time Music

Around the piano are grouped a quaint and dignified circle made complete by the presence of old age and of childhood. The ladies are dressed richly, the cap of the aged wife setting off her sweet, benignant face and silver hair. It is evening, and as the young people play and sing, it seems as if there might be invisible listeners whose silvery anthems take up and carry heavenward the sweetness of the earthly harmonies.

The artist has been especially happy in the arrangement of the family group. For to whom but to grandpapa, ever ready to heed the childish prattle, should the little one cling, and who should turn over the leaves, and sing with the fair accompanist, but the one who is seeking to win her hand, and have her as his companion on the road home to the better land. Sweet are the echoes of this evening song.

A Child's Complaint

"Do not interrupt so often, Marjorie. You must always wait before speaking until grown people get through."

The little one sighed wearily.

"Grown people never get through," she said.

I wonder whether there is not some truth in Marjorie's statement. Do we grown folk stop so often as we ought to give the children their turn? Are we not very thoughtless in our monopoly of the conversation, leaving so little place for them and their concerns.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—WIFE. Have cold bread for John, if he does not like hot. Eat hot yourself, if you prefer it.

—EARNEST INQUIRER. You can learn proof-reading by mail, in twelve weeks or less, but it is not so remunerative as teaching.

—S. B. Try letting your wife have her own way without opposition. If she refuses to give in to you, why not set her a good example?

—E. M. G. Wait until you are twenty-one. At eighteen and seventeen, young people should not commit themselves irrevocably in a love affair.

THE LITTLE LADY

(Of four bright years)

THE Little Lady hath for me
Only her kisses tender,
And in her eyes a light I see
That's all of earthly splendor.
She knows not when the world goes ill:—
She only knows she loves me still!

The Little Lady's smiles so bright
With mystic spells have bound me;
She waits for me when falls the night,
And twines her arms around me.
She knows not where my steps may be:—
She only knows her love for me!

Dear Lady of the tender years
And of the bright eyes beaming,
God keep those trusting eyes from tears,
And God be with your dreaming!
I know not what those dreams may be:—
I only know your love for me!

FRANK L. STANTON.

Something About Toys

IN a very thoughtful volume about child-nature, written by Elizabeth Harrison, a successful kinder-gartner, there are some passages about toys which may be suggestive to mothers. She says, "The toy-shops of any great city are, to him who can read the signs of the times, prophecies of the future of that city. They not only predict the future of that people, but they tell us of national tendencies. The following is the testimony unconsciously given by the shelves and counters in one of the large importing establishments, which gather together and send out the playthings of the world. The French toys include nearly all the pewter soldiers, all guns and swords; surely such would be the toys of a nation which produced a Napoleon. All Punch and Judy shows are of French manufacture; all doll tea-sets which have finger-bowls attached. The French doll mirrors the fashionable world, with all its finery and unneeded luxury, and hands it down to the little child.

"The German toys take another tone. They are heavier, stronger, and not so artistic; they represent the home and the more primitive forms of trade life. From Germany we get all our ready-made doll-houses, with their clean tile floors, and clumsy porcelain stoves, their parlors with round iron centre-tables, and stiff, ugly chairs, with the inevitable lace tidies. Here and there in these miniature houses, we see a tiny pot of artificial flowers. All such playthings tend to draw a child's thoughts to the home life.

"The Swiss toys are largely the bluntly-carved wooden cattle, sheep and goats, with equally blunt shepherds and shepherdesses.

"The English rag-doll is peculiarly national in its placidity of countenance. When I asked to see the American toys, my guide turned, and with a sweep of her hand, said, 'These trunks are American. All doll-trunks are manufactured in this country.' The Japanese and Chinese toys are a curious study, telling of national traits, as do their laws or their religion. They are endurable, made to last unchanged a long time. No flimsy tinsel is used."

Our American lavishness leads us to encumber our children with too many playthings. The tiny girl is bewildered by an array of dolls, instead of being encouraged to pour out her maternal affection on a single claimant, or on two or three babies. Given a tool-chest and liberty to use it, most boys will more enjoy the home-made playthings of their own production, than the most costly toys which money can procure.

Simplicity should be the key-note of children's lives, and in their hours of play they are forming the foundations of their future characters.

An Old Testament Gentleman

Isaac, the Peacemaker

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 1. GEN. 26: 12-25 --- GOLDEN TEXT: BLESSED ARE THE PEACEMAKERS, FOR THEY SHALL BE CALLED THE CHILDREN OF GOD. MATT. 5: 9

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

RUSKIN praises Rembrandt's "picture of a gentleman," "calm-eyed and firm-lipped, holding his glove;" but Paul pictures the true gentleman in his very heart, in 1. Corinthians, 13th chapter. Christ lived that picture. We can read in the word "Christ" wherever the word "charity" occurs. But an earlier realization of this gentleness, which made Christ great, and which the world despised till Christ glorified it, is the life of Isaac. We can read Isaac's name into Paul's picture. Try your own and see if it will fit.

PICTURE OF A GENTLEMAN OF THE OLDEN TIME

Isaac suffereth long and is kind; envieth not; vaunteth not himself, is not puffed up, doth not behave himself unseemly, seeketh not his own, is not provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

Abraham and Jacob lived adventurous, exceptional lives, in a wide range of travel. Isaac's whole life was spent in a radius of forty miles, bounded by Hebron, Gerar and Beer-Lahai-Roi. A quiet, average, every-day life was his, whose simple duties he glorified by daily faithfulness, illustrating the saying, "Little things are little things, but to do little things faithfully is a great thing." We are liable to hold before children too much a stimulus to imitate men of exceptional greatness. This lesson shows what beauty and glory a true gentleman may put into the commonplace life which must come to most of us.

It will be easy to remember that Christ was born as long before Isaac's old in our homes and Sunday Schools, after Christ. His home was Beersheba, the southernmost town in Palestine. Let us recall all we have previously learned of Isaac, as the child of promise, especially his gentle submission, at twenty-five years of age, when his father, Abraham, with bleeding heart, told him on Mount Moriah that God had commanded that he should be offered as a sacrifice. A modern illustration of a like trustful submission is the case of a child who was out driving with his parents, when one of them spoke of continuing the drive through the cemetery. "Oh, don't," said the child, with strange fear. Unable to understand his feeling, his parents drove on. He pleaded once more, "Don't, don't take me there." On they went, and he presently stilled his protests and snuggled trustfully, though sorrowfully, down by his mother's knee. When at length they came out of the cemetery he exclaimed in glad surprise, "What! Are you going to take me back again? I thought when they took children to the cemetery they left them there in the ground." He supposed he was being carried to burial, but in loving submission to his parents had brought himself to trust and obey. And trust was right at least, and brought him out safe at last.

Isaac's name meant laughter, and his gentleness and obedience even as a boy verified the prophecy in his name that he would bring joy to his home. Is it laughter and joy, or tears and sorrow we are bringing to our parents?

After the scene on Mount Moriah, the next impressive event in Isaac's Leading Events of Isaac's Life when he was thirty-six years of age. Then comes the beautiful story of his marriage to Rebekah. It is greatly to his credit that he did not fall into the polygamy which had become so common, even among good men, that God's Edenic rule of one wife seems to have been almost forgotten. Although God bore with this fault in Abraham and Jacob and David and Solomon, there is no word of approval for polygamy, or even of apology for it, in all the Bible, and the effects of it are shown to be bad by the trouble it made Abraham, culminating in the sending away of Hagar and Ishmael, and in like troubles in other households. It is amazing that Mormons dare appeal to the Bible when Christ condemned even the "consecutive polygamy" of divorce, and declared that Moses had only tolerated it temporarily because of the hardness of heart, the dullness of conscience, of Old Testament times. The time of such ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent. (With thousands of Mormon missionaries sowing tares in almost every part of the land, such teaching as we have put into the story of Isaac's marriage are needed to prevent young women especially from being lured away to the harems of our Turkey in America.) When Isaac was sixty years old, his interesting twins, Jacob and Esau, were born. And when he was seventy-five, his noble father, Abraham, died. The story of this lesson comes next in order when Isaac was ninety-two years old.

In this lesson we see Isaac as a peace-loving stock farmer, or ranchman, whose farming was done with crude plow and

Isaac, the Gentle Farmer rude sickle, but with consecration and prosperity. His "labor, life, love" were devoted to "God and the good of men."

Can we write "my" before it all? Let our consecration include not alone our prayer-meetings, but our daily labor, all of which should be "done heartily, as unto the Lord." God blessed Isaac's farm work, but his very prosperity, as always, brought the envy of the Philistines in its train. It is a reminder of the fact that human nature is the same in all ages, that the word "Philistines" is applied in our own time and country to the enemies of the divine order. Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, bade Isaac move on, because his prosperity was making trouble. It was the beginning of what is known in Europe as anti-Semitism, the hatred of Jews, because they are richer than the thriftless native peasants, who therefore drive them out of the country. Isaac might doubtless have held his own by marshaling again both). Soon after he went back to Beersheba, his place, and there met Jehovah, who said, "I am the God of Abraham, thy father; fear not, for I am with thee and will bless thee." And there he built an altar and dug a well, the visible embodiments of faith and works. The Old Testament does not say much of the future life, but the Testament reminds us, in recalling the saying, "I am the God of Abraham," that it implied immortality, since "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

"God of our fathers be the God of their succeeding race"

Glorify the common.

"Seek peace and pursue it."

"The bravest are the tenderest, the loving are the dauntless."

"You're no gentleman" if you are not a gentle man.

The old wells we need to reopen are the old truths of faith and redemption. And let us rebuild the broken altars, especially those of our homes.

Prosperity even in this world is oftenest found with envy and strife.

He whom God approves should not mind the envious approval of Philistines.

Years ago, Dr. Cuyler gave this illustration in speaking of "Rebuilding the Old Wells."

Illustrative Anecdotes That sagacious Christian teacher, Miss Smiley, shared me, beside her Saratoga cottage, a sparkling spring. She told me that when she first came there, and found that the soil was moist, she directed her gardener to excavate a circular space, in hopes that a full supply of water could be got. But all this digging failed. At length the gardener exclaimed: 'Ah! I've found it now.' He had discovered a old underdrain of a dead tree, with its brush and branches, along which all the water trickled away. As soon as the tree was removed, the water concentrated in the little unfailing spring. Even so, it is with the hearts of God's people. There can be no spiritual joy or peace, or power, or overflowing usefulness until the greedy outlets of selfishness or worldliness are stopped off and Christ becomes the perpetual, all-abiding and all-abounding well-spring in the soul. To fill a single ravenous sin costs more than to keep alive many graces."

Isaac was not much of a teacher, but he preached of peace and gentleness, actions that speak louder than words, which reminds us of a good story for boys, and for girls, too: "When I grow enough," said Eddie, "I'm going to be a preacher." "What is a preacher?" said grandma. Eddie answered in surprise: "A preacher is the people what the Bible means and he says, 'Thirdly, my brethren and everybody listens. It's nice to have people listen to you.' Grandma smiled, "I think you're old enough to be a preacher now." "I'm not," said Eddie. "What is a preacher do first?" said grandma. "He takes a text and 'splains it," said Eddie. "Here is a good text," said grandma: "'Be kindly affectioned one to another.' I should like to have you preach a week from that text." "Preach a week? Why, grandma, I can't. There's nothing to 'splain about that. You just be kind and that's all there is of it." "Can't you be kind to everybody you meet for a week?" said grandma. "Would that be possible?" said Eddie. "It would be the very best kind. A good preacher has to preach that way, or the people would not listen to what he says in the pulpit." "Well," said Eddie, with a sigh, "I suppose I can try." The next day Eddie said to himself, "It is not kind to the teacher to per in school," and so he didn't. "It is not kind to mamma to play on the road and keep dinner waiting," he said to her school, and hurried home. At the end of the week grandma said, "How do you like preaching?" Eddie answered: "I like it, grandma, but I guess everybody else was preaching that text, too, for everybody has been kind to me."

Isaac may be called the first Quaker, and such a life in a woman is pictured in Whittier's hymn for a Quaker woman's burial:

Her still and quiet life flowed on
As meadow streamlets flow,
Where fresher green reveals alone
The noiseless way they go.
How reverent in our midst she stood
Or knelt in grateful praise;
What grace in Christian womanhood
Was in her household ways.

those three hundred servants of his father who had defeated five chiefs, with others he had added to his increasing household; but he believed rightly, that in the end more is lost than gained by fighting, and moved on to pastures new. Often it takes less courage to fight than to refuse to fight. Perhaps Isaac had erred in going to the Philistines at all, though famine driven. It had already led him, as a like course had twice led his father, to lie about his wife, a lie in which he vainly trusted instead of God, the failure of which offers yet another refutation of the theory of those who say it would be right to lie to save life.

From Gerar, Isaac moved a few miles to the Valley of Gerar, where were many wells that his father's servants had dugged with great labor, which the perverse Philistines had filled up. These Isaac reopened by the toil of his servants, to slake the thirst of man and beast. One of them proved to be a well-spring of unusually sparkling water. This the Philistine herdsmen strove for, crying, "The water is ours." It was the custom to name wells, and Isaac named this one Contention (Esek), and once more chose to move rather than fight. The same strife occurred about the next well he reopened, and he called that Enmity (Sitrah), and left that also. Peace conquered at last, for over the next well that he reopened there was no strife, and he called it "Room" (Reho-

WON BY A WIFE'S PRAYERS

How the Rev. Dr. Howard Russell, National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, Came to be a Christian

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

In 1882 Howard H. Russell was a young lawyer, in Corning, a town in South-western Iowa. He was very earnest and diligent in his profession, but was not a Christian either in his habits of life or in his business standards. He had been born and reared in a Christian household. His father was a Protestant Episcopal Minister; he is still living, and is rector emeritus of an Iowa parish.

Young Russell knew the claims of the Gospel, but had never responded personally to them. His wife was a lawyer's daughter, and his youthful affection for her was one of the incidents which led him to adopt the legal profession. Her father was Howard's preceptor in his legal studies, and when the latter was admitted to the bar, the father offered him a partnership. He was married in 1880, and soon thereafter, under the influence of a godly pastor, the wife became a more consecrated and active Christian, and naturally became anxious for her husband's conversion. At her request, several of their friends joined with her in regular seasons of private prayer for him.

A series of revival meetings was announced, but the young lawyer felt no interest in them, and declined his wife's earnest invitation to attend with her, making excuse of office duties. Returning home late one night, he found his wife, contrary to her custom, awaiting him. She said she was troubled about him,—but his heart was hardened against any approaches. He said he was all right and requested her to dismiss the subject. She spoke tenderly, but said she felt he was all wrong, and begged him to just let her pray with him; but when she pressed the matter of prayer, he left the house in anger. Clearly the Devil was master that night.

Howard went to the hotel in the town, stayed all night, and remained away next day until supper-time. When he returned home in the evening to supper, his wife received him affectionately, as though nothing had happened. He thought she had concluded to let the matter drop. He went to the office after supper, and on coming home late that second night, he found her again waiting. She gave him a loving welcome, and Dr. Russell declares that he shall remember to eternity the mingled look of deep affection and anxious solicitude upon her face, as she looked up into his eyes and said, "I prayed for you, Howard, all night last night!" That melted him a good deal. Dr. Russell has often exclaimed, when preaching: "Mother, wife, when you are eager enough to pray all night, God will come with unusual power to convince and convert your son or husband!" He could not that night refuse his wife's entreaty that he should let her pray for him, and knelt down with her, though he had not the slightest intention of yielding to God.

Mrs. Russell was desperately in earnest, and poured out her agonized appeal to the Father, that he would reveal to her husband his dreadful peril, and show him that certain things in his life made him the enemy of right and the foe of Christ. As she prayed, God held up before the husband a mirror, in which he saw his wretched soul. Few people have been more vividly convicted of their sins. In that hour, the proud, hard-hearted young lawyer saw that he was tried in God's court as a criminal, condemned and sentenced by the Great Judge. Yet he still tried to resist the Spirit. He struggled to summon up reason, and to boldly scoff against God; but in spite of all his efforts, God's will was becoming master of his will. He felt sure that it must be then or never. He had a distinct sensation that the chains which encircled him, and which he tried to hold secure, were loosening, and as the urgent voice by his side appealed to God to leave him not until his stubborn will should soften, he became weak and helpless in body, under the mighty hand of God. Then he surrendered, unreservedly, utterly. At last he summoned up strength to say: "Lillian, I give it up." "You give up what?" "I give up all sin."

Then she broke out in a jubilant prayer of thanksgiving. From that hour he was a radically changed man. After a few months, his wife and baby daughter were with him at Oberlin, where he went to make preparation for the ministry.

Dr. Russell's ministry has been a fruitful one, and perhaps never more fruitful than now, when, as National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, which has its organization in over thirty States of the Union, he is putting all his energy into the great war against the saloon. But all this moral energy had its birth that night when his wife prayed for him. Dr. Russell says: "Whenever I revisit the home at Corning, I go and kneel in that upper room, on the spot where my chains fell off, and fervently thank God for the emancipation which came through the persistent intercession of my noble Lillian, my faithful wife."

OUR CHILDREN'S CHAPEL AT MONT-LAWN

THE two brief chapel services held daily at Mont-Lawn are so bright, cheery and songful, that our children, far from finding prayer and worship irksome, come flying from all directions when the bell rings. They flock first to the principal building and there form in line, two abreast, under their teachers' directions, the housemother Collins reviewing them from the porch and seeing if all her little flock is there. At a given signal, the lads separate and stand in line, single file, on either side of the walk: off come their hats and then the little maids, "two by two led by the Housemother's assistant, pass through; the little lads close up their ranks and follow. In front of all goes the gallant little drummer boy, pounding away valiantly. It is quite a long, winding path from the house to the chapel; yet as the head of the column reaches the chapel door the children who bring up the rear are just leaving their position in front of the house; and so, from where the housemother stands on the porch, you behold a charming sight—an endless chain of children stretching away around the great lawn, across the road, and linking, as it were, with a bright and living band, the house door and the chapel door. Before the latter the drum-beat sinks into silence, and song begins:

How beautiful to walk in the steps of the Saviour,
And in paths of light.

When the congregation of wee folks are in their places, other happy Gospel songs follow the marching chorus; there is a short tender prayer—just a "little talk with Jesus" for these children of the poor, putting all their wants and needs before him; simple faith, thanking him for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home and the kind friends who help to send them there. More songs of praise, and perhaps a pretty Bible story, follow. The Twenty-third Psalm is always recited in concert, and the Lord's Prayer is a part of every service. Every child who has an

for their beloved little temple. On the wall back of the platform, and on a side wall which is not seen in our photograph (we thought their friends would rather see our children's faces than anything else), hang a number of scrolls, with our little folks' favorite Gospel songs printed on them in very large letters. You do not see, either, the stands of magnificent ferns flanking the platform, and the blossoms embowering the desk; but you do see the words "Welcome Home," which were wrought in some feathery evergreens on the wall facing the desk. Dr. Klopsch was on the platform the day this picture was taken. He had just returned from a long journey across the Atlantic; and the fullness of joy in the hearts of his child-friends sought expression in pretty ways. Notice of his arrival was short, and there wasn't time to finish the scheme of decoration planned, but anyone will concede that the two words completed were eloquent enough to meet with warm appreciation. Next day (Sunday), when Dr. Klopsch came to speak to them, this addition greeted his eyes: "The Lord shall preserve thy going out, and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore." Happy conclusion was this beautiful text to the impromptu celebration begun Saturday, when, perceiving their friend, returned even "as he was afar off," nearly 200 children ran down the road to meet him, waving little American flags and shouting joyous greetings. This was one of Mont-Lawn's merriest days.

To see the flower-like child-faces uplifted, morning and evening, in our chapel, drinking in the Word of Life, is a sight that would gladden any heart. This work is for the saving of souls as well as of bodies. Will you help us? Only $3 gives a child of the tenements a ten-days' outing at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $15 five; $30 makes ten—a whole colony—happy, and brings them under influences that may stamp them as the Master's own forever.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

F. C., Oakland, Calif., writes:

I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayer, for the restoration of my only son.

E. S., Spokane, Wash., writes:

Not long ago I received so clear an answer to prayer that I could not doubt. Many prayers have God answered for me.

M. C. E. A., Kansas City, Mo., writes:

I enclosed ten dollars for China, given as a thank offering to God for sparing our little three-month-old babe, who was quite sick.

M. E. S. S., writes:

I felt quite disturbed over a dear one, but took it to God in prayer, and had faith to believe he would answer it. And he did, thanks be to his holy name.

Wife, Faison, N. C., writes:

I make this public acknowledgment of my gratitude to God for relief for my husband and myself from a heavy trouble, fully believing it was in answer to continued, faithful prayer.

A. L. P., Alexander, Ariz., writes:

The Lord has answered two of my prayers almost immediately—as he has done many times in my life before. Help has come in such unexpected ways, that none but his hand could have sent it.

H. M. D., Hurricane, W. Va., writes:

A short time ago, I was very much troubled. I went to God in prayer, and I am thankful to acknowledge that he has heard and answered my pleadings. Now I am happy in the change. God answers prayer.

P. K., Moosomin, Can., writes:

In this sceptical age, I wish to bear testimony to the fact that God answers prayer. I have not to refer to the Bible or to the Oriental cornfields for proof. I have it in the experience of my past life. When the right kind of prayer is offered God will answer.

A. M., Windsor, Can., writes:

Reading your answers to prayer, I was encouraged to plead with God to help me overcome a certain weakness that I had. I am glad to acknowledge that my prayer has been answered, and I write this hoping that others will believe and be blessed.

J. H. C., Canister, N. Y., writes:

I take quite an interest in your notes on prayer.

In the month of May, 1854, I received a line from the home of my youth that my youngest sister was at the point of death. I found her in the last stages of quick consumption. The parents were not Christians. On my way back home, the Lord rolled a wonderful burden on me for her. In the morning it was there. I went out in the woods and struggled in prayer till midday, when the burden left, and peace came—such sweet peace—as I had never before enjoyed. The next day I received a line saying: "Your sister still lingers;" and later, this: "The Lord has wonderfully saved her." She called all of her loved ones to her, and pleaded with them to give themselves to Christ and meet her in heaven. Then, for several minutes, angels were in the room. She would say: "Don't you see them? How beautiful they sing!" then she quietly passed away. I can but think that sister has been my guardian angel these long years.

A Famous Bishop Dead

Bishop Littlejohn, of Long Island, Passes Away. After Half a Century of Useful Service

CHRISTIAN men of all denominations may well unite in the mourning that is felt in the Protestant Episcopal Church over the death of Bishop Littlejohn of Long Island. The Bishop was of so broad a mind that men who differed from him on questions of doctrine or church government could be on terms of cordial friendship with him, and were sure of his brotherly respect and sympathy. Indeed, the work which brought him most prominently before the

THE LATE BISHOP LITTLEJOHN

Christian world of America and Europe was the effort, which his brethren confided to his hands, of preparing a document which suggested a basis for the union of the sects in one comprehensive church. This document, known as the Quadrilateral, bears the marks of his loving, tolerant mind, and it has had a powerful influence in attracting to the Church men who longed for that union which Christ hoped would exist among his people.

The Bishop's death was sudden. He was on a visit to Williamstown, Mass., and had been spending a short time with his old friend, Bishop Worthington, at Lenox, when the end came. On the morning of August 3 he rose at his usual hour and told a member of his family that he was in excellent health and spirits. After breakfast he strolled out to call on a friend. As he crossed the campus he complained of a slight dizziness, and a few minutes later fell unconscious to the ground. He was carried to his hotel, where in half an hour he breathed his last.

Bishop Littlejohn was nearly seventy-seven years of age, but there were no signs of senility in either body or mind. Only recently, when the rapid growth of his diocese seemed to demand that some assistance was required, he declared that he was capable of as much work as ever he was, and would not hear of the appointment of an assistant. He was a native of New York State, and was educated at Union College, Schenectady. His first pastoral work was done at Amsterdam, whence he removed to Meriden, Conn., and afterwards to Springfield, Mass. In 1851 he became rector of St. Paul's, New Haven, Conn., where he labored successfully until 1860, when he became rector of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn. The work he did in that parish was so thorough and energetic that it was raised from one of the feeblest to one of the strongest in the city. In 1868 three new bishoprics were created in New York, and Dr. Littlejohn was elected to that of Central New York; but he was afterwards elected to the diocese of Long Island, and accepted the latter in preference to the former.

It was his hope that Holy Trinity would be made the Cathedral of the diocese; but the project was not acceptable, either to the congregation or to the clergy. He, therefore, waived his own inclinations and accepted the fine edifice at Garden City, which had been erected as a memorial of Mr. A. T. Stewart, the millionaire dry-goods merchant of New York. There were numerous legal difficulties connected with the endowment, but the Bishop's tact and forbearance ultimately triumphed and a satisfactory settlement was effected.

Spiritual Acquaintance

How Men May Come to Know God and to be Known by Him

MANY of the teachers of the present day would have us believe that God is unknowable. The very title of Agnostic, which they take, implies not only that they do not know, but that they despair of knowing. In one sense it is true. We cannot know the Infinite completely. People who talk as familiarly of God as they do of their acquaintances, and presume to tell us what he wishes and thinks, simply prove that they have never realized the infinite majesty and perfections of the Deity. "His ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts, for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his thoughts higher than our thoughts." But should we, on that account, make no effort to understand as much of him as is possible to the human mind? The little child of a great statesman cannot grasp the problems on which his father's mind is exercised, but who would say that the child has no knowledge of his father? There is a whole world of knowledge and perception in the father's mind that the child cannot enter into, but the father has a side to his character with which the child may be thoroughly familiar. Most important, too, is the consideration that it is the side of his character which concerns the child, which he can understand. He cannot know the principles on which he conducts international negotiations, but he can know what his father expects him to do, and what will please him. The child, we will say, is at school. He receives a letter from his father. He can just spell it out, but there are some things in it that he does not understand. Some one who does not know the father undertakes to explain the letter to the child, and he puts a harsh and unkindly meaning to some of the expressions. The child stops him with an assurance that he is wrong. "I do not understand the letter," he says. "I do not know what my father means by those expressions; but I know my father, and I know he does not mean what you say. He is a very gentle, kind man, and he would never say such things as you suggest." So it is with the Christian. He has a profound reverence for God; he knows that the Being who created the universe and controls the movements of the myriad worlds in space, is far beyond the conception of his puny mind; but he knows God's kindness, his love and tenderness. The evidences are all around him, he feels them in his soul. He knows God, though he does not know all of God.

Spiritual acquaintance implies also mutual knowledge. Is that possible? May we presume to think that God knows us? Can it be that out of the millions of persons on this globe, and possibly the myriads on other worlds, that we are of sufficient consequence for God to know us? The improbability of it has kept many at a distance from him. The utter insignificance of the individual as compared with the Almighty has depressed many a seeking soul, has silenced prayer and held back the striving after progress.

Perhaps the perception of this feeling may have been one reason for the Incarnation. In Christ God condescends to us. He comes near to humanity, and we begin to understand him better. As we study Christ's life we get a new view of God's character. "He that hath seen me," he said, "hath seen the Father." What then are we to understand that the love and tenderness, the patience and gentleness, the sweet compassion and magnanimity of Christ are the Father's traits shining through the human flesh of our Lord's personality? So it appears. God is a spirit, we say. I cannot understand spirit. I cannot conceive of a being without any of the visible signs by which I form my ordinary conceptions. But I read of Christ and learn that he is the expression, the manifestation of God. Now I can understand God better. He is translated into my language, as Christ stands before me.

So acquaintance with God grows. We come in contact with him. As we should act in ordinary life if some long sought connection was formed, if we were admitted to friendship with some deeply revered man, so we must act toward God. We should be careful to ascertain all we could of his character, should look into our own nature to see if there was anything there uncongenial, anything that would shock our friend or make him shrink from association with us, and should strive to get rid of it. As a lover is on his best behavior in the presence of his loved one, utters no coarse word, is not angry nor mean, and tries to be better and purer, that he may be more worthy of her love, so the Christian longing for acquaintance with God, feeling that he is always in his presence, strives after Christ-likeness, and beholding his beauty as in a mirror, is transformed into the same image.

A Remarkable Career

ONE of the oldest, if not indeed the very oldest, living minister of the Gospel in the United States is the Rev. Archibald H. Mitchell, D.D., a Methodist preacher. He lives at Summerfield, Ala. Dr. Mitchell was born October 15, 1807, and is now nearly ninety-four years old. He was educated at the University of Georgia, at Athens. He graduated there in 1828. He has for years been the oldest living alumnus of that institution, and in June of this year he made the journey of more than two hundred miles to be present at its annual commencement. He entered the active ministry in January, 1831. The Presiding Elder who licensed him to preach was the grandfather of the late Governor Samford, himself an earnest Methodist.

Dr. Mitchell spent sixty years in the active ministry before he was superannuated, at the age of eighty-four. Twenty years he was a pastor, twenty years a Presiding Elder, and twenty years he spent in college work, by appointment of the Bishop. The first five years he was in the ministry he received a total of only $550 salary. The extra fifty dollars was because he was married in his

Rev. J. P. James of the A. M. E. Church, Samana, Santo Domingo, writes to the CHRISTIAN HERALD that there is a church membership at Samana of over 500. Preparations are being made to erect a church, the corner-stone having been laid on July 14. It will probably be finished early in October. Church buildings are also sorely needed in the capital.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has been trying to decide, for his evangelistic work this fall, between Canada, New Zealand, United States and England. The United Kingdom has won, and he will open his first mission in Belfast, Ireland, on the 1st of October. Mr. J. A. Black, of the Y. M. C. GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Naval Chaplain Under Fire

It was exactly 9:40 A.M. when a great puff of smoke came from the forward eleven-inch gun of the Maria Teresa, the ship dropping short, but right in line with us. I remember what Captain Philip softener had said about the War of the Rebellion, which he was in, claiming that whichever side opened fire on the Sabbath was already defeated, so I felt rejoiced that the enemy had fired the first shot. I really believe I was a little superstitious just then. The battle was now ranging in deadly earnest. Shot after shot was fired at the various ships. The Maria Teresa, being in the lead, received the concentrated fire of our ships for some time. Then the two torpedo boats rushed out and the shout went along our deck: "Torpedo boats, sir, in our smoke!" Our hearts began to beat very rapidly, as the destroyers were the instruments of death we dreaded most; but to our surprise, instead of heading for us, they rushed on like two race horses close to the shore, each trying to outpoint the other. The Pluton was run over the rocks, after being disabled, and was soon blown up. The Furor sank in deep water a few minutes later; this was about 30.

Our ship had been struck a few minutes before that, right in the smoke-stack; and he again is shown the hand of Providence directing our beloved Captain. The fire from the enemy's ship had become very general, shells were screaming around our bridge, and the Captain said to the officers up there with him: "We had better go down to the lower bridge." Going down the only remaining ladder for them to descend, they had just stepped off, when crash went a shell, right into the pilot house where they were standing on a moment before. Had they not left when they did, one or more of them would probably have been killed.

We again began to exchange compliments with the Maria Teresa, who was firing at us as rapidly as she could, but chaiming of her men was exceedingly poor. At last she was forced to surrender, and at 10:35 her white flag went up, as she yellow and the red came down. The flames were roaring out of every side of her, and curling up twice as high as the mast, and we heard the crackling of the timber as it burned so fiercely on that ship, then a wreck, which only a few moments before was as magnificent a look-inship as ever sailed the Caribbean Sea. Just three minutes after the Maria Teresa went on shore the Oquendo had to follow her example, and, hauling down her colors, hoisted the white flag. This caused our men to feel elated, and they were in the mood of cheering, when our Captain, a perfect man in battle, yet as soft-hearted as a child when it was necessary, surmised what their intentions were, so, lifting both hands up in the air, he stamped on the bridge, and, shouting at the men, said: "Don't cheer, boys; those poor fellows are dying!" and it is needless to say they didn't.

At 12:45 the Oregon sent a shell after the Colon, to let her know that we were still pursuing. Finally she was hemmed in on all sides, and at 1:20 ran down her colors, as her Commanding Officer begged her. We signalled: "Enemy has surrendered." The signal was repeated by the Vixen, then coming up behind us, to the New York, some miles to the eastward, but was not acknowledged.

From A Chaplain's Experience Aboard and Ashore, by Rev. Harry W. Jones, A.M., D.D., Chaplain U. S. Navy. No more interesting book has ever been written concerning the active duties of a naval chaplain in war time. Chaplain Jones' experiences, from the time of his appointment on the Texas, until the close of the war with Spain were dramatic and exciting. Greatest interest will be about his story of the Santiago campaign and the destruction by Schley of Cervera's fleet. There are many other incidents that will command the attention of the reader. The volume is well illustrated, cloth bound, pages 300. Price, bridge paid, to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, $1.00; others $1.25. A. G. Sherwood & Co., 47 Lafayette Place, New York, publishers.

As the Oregon closed in, her band was playing "The Star-Spangled Banner." All of the Spanish crew were on the deck of the Colon; the men on the Brooklyn were shouting and cheering. Our Commanding Officer came from the bridge; all hands were on the quarter deck, as we were then with our stern toward the enemy. As our Captain came toward us he uncovered his head, then, looking at his men, said: "Men, I have always had implicit confidence in the Texas, my officers and my crew, but my greatest confidence is in Almighty God, and I wish to make public acknowledgment, here today, of my belief in prayer; and I ask every man of you to uncover his head with me, and silently thank God for our deliverance and for the victory he has given us." There they stood, stripped to the waist, blood streaming from their strained muscles, their bodies stained from the powder, the coal dust and smoke of the fire-room, but from the heart of every one of us that beautiful Sabbath morning went up the most fervent prayer that ever left the heart of man, as we thanked God for the victory he had given us and for our miraculous escape. The Captain did not know I was on deck until after he had spoken, when he happened to see me standing on the starboard side, so sent an ensign to me, apologizing for depriving me of the privilege of performing my duty of offering an audible prayer. I sent back my compliments and, going over, took the Captain's hand and said: "Captain, I am glad you did not know I was here, sir, because this act of yours has proven to me that you are the kind of a man I always believed you to be—that is, a man who has faith in prayer." Later on, the Executive Officer came to me and said: "Chaplain, did you hear those remarks of the Commanding Officer?" I said: "Yes, sir." He said: "That was the most manly act I have ever witnessed in my life."

THE GOOD MAN'S SON

Isaac Blessed for his Father's Sake

BY MRS. M. FANTER

ISAAC was in a sense a resurrection man, for it was he, as the son of promise, whom Abraham was commanded to offer in sacrifice. In intent and purpose he had been offered to God and accepted. This gives a peculiar solemnity to the life of this patriarch. Abraham was the head of God's people Israel, as well as being by virtue of his personal faith in God, the example and father of all them that believe. Isaac was only the head of God's chosen outward people as being his father's son; and only a man of faith as a follower of Abraham. Isaac was tested in the same way as Abraham had been tested, by a famine in the land. Isaac also sought to help himself, and went down to Abimelech, king of Gerar.

Isaac sowed in that land, and found a hundred fold, and the Lord blessed him. God could only fulfil his Word, "I will bless thee," to his servants when they met him in his will (Gen. 18: 19). Israel is an earthly people, and the blessings promised to them are earthly blessings. To his own disciples Jesus says, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world" (John 16: 33). Don't let us be astonished if God rewards our faithfulness not by temporal blessings, but by fresh tests of faith and of endurance. Paul looked for nothing else than "fellowship with his sufferings" (Phil. 3: 10).

But even temporal blessing has its trials. The Philistines envied Isaac (Gen. 26: 14), and there began to be strife between the Hebrews and the Philistines about that need of all needs in an Eastern land—water. But Isaac would not fight. He had faith to wait God's time, and to yield until that time came; and then he recognized, not his own patience, but God's hand. This is no small lesson to learn. How many of us have lost power with others by worrying them, and trying to force things before their time. "They that wait for me shall not be ashamed" (Isa. 49: 23, R.V.). God has his time for all things, and his time has come when he has succeeded in bringing his children, who are in his school, into the right attitude towards him.

From thence he went up to Beersheba. This was an historic place, for here it was that Abimelech's predecessor and Isaac's father had sworn together, and made a covenant, calling the well Beersheba, "the well of the oath," in consequence, and Abraham "called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God" (Gen. 21: 22-34). This move pleased God. "And the Lord appeared to him the same night, and said, I am the God of Abraham thy father; fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee and multiply thy seed for my servant Abraham's sake." Again Isaac must know how much he was indebted to his father; again he must learn how true God was to his faithful servant. "And Isaac builded an altar there." This was Isaac's first altar, built in the presence of the heathen; it was a step forward in his life, "And he called there upon the name of the Lord." This was a testimony in the presence of the heathen.

Much depends upon the position we take with those who know not God. If we begin with a testimony by word of mouth when our life is not right before them, we place a barrier in the way of their conversion. The heathen abroad and the unconverted at home may and do dislike the lives of those who are true to God, but deep down in their hearts they respect and often envy them. There in Beersheba Isaac pitched his tent, and there his servants digged a well. "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him" (Prov. 16: 7). King Abimelech went to him from Gerar, not alone: he brought with him his friend Ahuzath, and Phicol the captain of his host. Isaac was at first, very naturally, suspicious, and asked: "Wherefore are ye come unto me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you?" "We saw plainly that the Lord was with thee," was the answer, "and we said, Let there now be an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee; that thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have sent thee away in peace: thou art now the blessed of the Lord."

Isaac had trusted in the Lord; he had not contended for the wells which the herdsmen of Gerar stole from him; he had not resisted when Abimelech sent him away from him, but had left his cause in the hands of him who had said, "I will bless thee." And now his enemies come and say, "We saw plainly that the Lord was with thee." Isaac had not trusted his God in vain; he had been willing to take a low place with man, as he had been willing to be the sacrifice upon the altar, and now his enemies come and beg for alliance with him! Let us trust our God, who "worketh for him that waiteth for him" (Isaiah 64: 4, R.V.). Isaac made them a feast, and they did eat and drink. And they rose up betimes in the morning, and swore one to another, as their fathers had done before them. And "Isaac sent them away," but in another spirit from that which had actuated Abimelech when he sent him away. The same day Isaac's servants found water. Now there was the well, and the altar, and the oath; God was recognized, and God had blessed, and he had made Isaac's enemies to be at peace with him because he had trusted in his God. "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." He who is our Peace dwells within the members of his body as their life-power to be lamblike, children of peace.

READY COOKED FOOD.

Famous Around the Camp Fire.

People going into camp should not forget to take along a goodly supply of Grape-Nuts, the ready-cooked food. This can be eaten dry and does not require any preparation by the cook, or the food can be made into a variety of delightful dishes, such as puddings, etc.

One of the favorite methods by old timers is to drop three or four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts into a cup of coffee. The Grape-Nuts add a peculiar and delicious flavor to the coffee and give one a more piquant article of food than even the famous doughnuts and coffee of old New England.

People who cannot digest coffee should not forget that Postum Food Coffee, if properly made, furnishes a very delicious beverage, either hot or cold, closely approaching the flavor of the mild and delicious grades of Java.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Sept. 25

1. Is it right for a Christian to make plans for the future, or should one live simply from day to day?
2. Should we encourage a person to go to church who apparently derives no benefit, but seems to go to criticize and find fault?
3. Who was the greatest of America's poets and why?
4. If it is right to deny one's self in order to save money for Christ's cause, should one deny one's self all pleasures involving expenditure, or where should the line be drawn?
5. What is the best way of dealing with Mormon emissaries who invade a community to break down its morality and make proselytes?

Questions of the Week

1. If a dear friend and an enemy were both in danger simultaneously, am I in duty bound to aid my enemy first, or should I yield to the promptings of my heart and succor my friend?

You should consider their qualifications for heaven. If you are sure that the friend's soul is safe, and that he is prepared to meet his God in peace, while the enemy is in danger of the second death—literally, a spiritual wreck—then you should put forth every effort to rescue the latter first. There may still be some good quality in him, and he may yet be led to walk in the path of righteousness. If you rescue him, and he has one iota of manly principle in him, he will be your lifelong friend. On the other hand, suppose the friend is a minister of the Gospel who, with divine aid, has been the means of turning many souls to Christ, and who is still engaged in this work, then you should by all means first rescue him. If the friend is a lady whom you have invited to accompany you anywhere, you should rescue her first, as you are responsible for her safety. In every case, you should do as you think Christ would do.

OLIVER W. HEATWOLE.

In the situation cited in the above question, a man, obeying the Scriptural injunction to "love your enemies," owes neither a greater or less duty to his friend than to his enemy, for, under such injunction, they stand upon precisely the same footing. He would be no more justified in purposely abandoning his enemy to save his friend than in abandoning his friend for his enemy. It is certain, however, that no man could be condemned for following his natural impulse to save one who was dear to him. Assuredly he is not bound to save his enemy because he is his enemy. On the other hand, if his mind is so constructed as to be capable of forming a definite plan of action, and he takes advantage of the situation to purposely leave his enemy to his fate and succor his friend, he is morally nothing more or less than a murderer.

2. Is the world growing better or worse? Briefly, what are the facts in evidence?

The world is growing worse and will continue to grow worse until Christ comes. The most ominous evidence is not the increase of crime, which every newspaper shows; nor the increase of immorality, which is proved in the divorce courts; nor the spread of corruption in municipal and national affairs, which is the subject of complaint in all lands; nor the growing selfishness and greed which are making the rich richer and are driving the poor to despair—all these might exist without causing the alarm which comes from the condition of the Church. The Church is the salt of the earth, and when that loses its savor, as it is now doing, wherewith can the world be salted? Never since the time of the apostles has the Church sunk to its present condition of powerlessness and practical infidelity. The loss of confidence in God's Word, the worldliness of professing Christians, and the desecration of the Lord's Day were never so pronounced as now. The Church is on the downgrade, and the world has it for a companion in its course toward destruction.

ERNEST F. WAUGH.

There is a wide diversity of opinion upon this question arising from the diverse standpoints probable, that "this dying charge was not the offspring of personal revenge, but a measure of administrative wisdom." "David," says Wordsworth, "does not mention among Joab's sins that which caused him personally the most poignant grief, the murder of Absalom." He dwells on the fact that Joab had treacherously slain Abner and had also assassinated Amasa, shedding the blood of war in peace. Shimei had blasphemously insulted the royal majesty of Israel. David, it is true, had sworn to spare Shimei, but this oath was not binding on Solomon. David seems to feel that he had been too lax in punishing crime. His own guilt, though repented of, may have made him feel that the son of Zeruah, in particular, was too strong for him. Hence this charge to Solomon as keeper of God's law and guardian of the kingdom's safety.

AMELIA HOYT.

David's solemn charge to Solomon, that upon his becoming king he should take the lives of Joab and Shimei, seems to have been prompted by a spirit of revenge against these two men, rather than having been due to the decisions of a judicial mind. In one sense, the execution of these men may be looked upon as an act of retributive justice (they being the enemies of the king), yet the personal vindictiveness that David cherished in the matter, and the absence of a disinterested purpose, to secure justice and the welfare and security of Israel, his kingdom, calls for condemnation of David in his instructions to his son. The act, from the proper motive, produced, which afforded a hint for manufacture.

Just when the process of glass-making discovered cannot be told with accuracy. Specimens of Egyptian glass exist which date back to about 2400 B.C., and glass bottles represented in Egyptian sculptures of 4000. Also various operations of glass-blowing portrayed among the bas-reliefs of Hassan, about 2000 B.C. 5. Is the practice of condoning immorality men justifiable? That is to say, should a male offender be ostracized by those who know him, as severely as they ostracize offenders of the other sex?

The practice of condoning immorality men, so far from being justifiable is most reprehensible, but is, alas, too common, and strangely enough, women are as ready to do so as men. The mother, who would be horrified at the thought of her son marrying a woman who had fallen, even though she repented and reformed, has no scruples giving her pure daughter in marriage to a man who has led an immoral life. Women associate with men who are notorious guilty, while they shrink in disgust from fallen women. Perhaps, if they would ostracize the guilty man, the punishment might do something toward the protection of their daughters from temptation. The respect in which we hold woman makes the crime more reviling in her, and the consequences of her crime may entail a greater wrong on the family, if the guilt is the same in man and woman, the punishment should not be more severe for the one than the other. We may be sure that God will not discriminate because of sex. If he discriminates at all, it will be between the tempter and the tempted, and that case the heavier punishment would more frequently fall to the man.

JOHN E. WRIGHT

No immorality should be condoned, and repentant sinner should be ostracized, should be ready to help all we can the man the woman who wants to turn away from. If we can judge between the man and woman who have offended against the law of society and of God, the manner of treatment of them should depend, not upon their sex, but upon the degree and persistence of their guilt. At the same time, it should borne in mind that the woman who lives impure life strikes a severer blow at the foundation of the home, than any man's impropriety can strike.

from which it is viewed, and from the different interpretations put upon those passages of Scripture referring to the closing scenes of the present dispensation. The facts, however, seem to indicate that the world is growing better. Because: 1. There never was such an interest in the devotional study of the Bible as now, and this is a Divinely-pledged and Spiritually-potent factor for good (Psalm 119: 9, 11, 130; I. Tim. 3: 15, 16; Rom. 1: 16). 2. There never has been a deeper, nor more widespread purpose on the part of Christian workers to honor the Holy Spirit, and magnify his office in work for the betterment of the world than now. 3. There were never so many spheres of Christian activity, filled by consecrated and trained workers as now. 4. There never was such a spirit of fraternity and inter-denominational fellowship among Christians as now. 5. There never was so great and widespread a feeling of the brotherhood of man as at present. This is shown by the quick and hearty response made from all parts of the world when any great calamity befalls a state or nation. Nevertheless, we are taught that "evil men shall wax worse and worse" (II. Tim. 3: 13); but while the truth of that saying is apparent, it seems equally apparent that the world in general is growing better.

B. F. WHITTEMORE.

3. Was David justified in ordering Solomon to have Joab and Shimei executed (I. Kings 2: 5-9)?

Dean Stanley, strange to say, avers that in the order given to Solomon, King David "bequeathed a dark legacy of long cherished vengeance." Dr. Terry's view seems more would probably have been justifiable, but considering the motive that inspired David, we must say that he erred.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

4. When, where, and under what circumstances was glass discovered or invented?

Historians tell us that glass was first made in Egypt, as glass bottles are represented in the earliest Egyptian sculptures. That the Egyptians used glass as a means of magnifying, is evident from the fact that their glass mosaics were so delicately ornamented that some of the feathers of the birds and other details can be made out only with a lens. Theophrastus, who flourished about 300 years before Christ, described glass as having been made out of the sand of the river Belus, and the sphere of Archimedes is a remarkable instance of the perfection to which the art of glass-making had been brought at that early period, namely, B. C. 209. Virgil, in his Fifth Æneid, compares the clearness of the water in the Fæstine Lake to glass, and Horace, in his third book of the Odes, mentions glass in such terms as show that its transparency was brought to great perfection. Pliny relates the manner of the discovery of glass. It was, he says, first made of sand found in the river Belus, a small stream of Galilee, running from the foot of Mt. Carmel. The report of the discovery was that a Phœnician merchant ship, laden with nitre, or mineral alkali, being driven upon the coast, and the crew coming ashore for provisions, and dressing their victuals upon the sand made use of some lumps of alkali to support their kettles. Hence a vitrification of the sand beneath the fire was

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

LOUIS KLOPSCH, PROPRIETOR

NEW YORK, AUGUST 28, 1901

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

United States Treasury

Washington, D. C.

In the eight great departments of the Government at Washington there are employed something over 25,000 clerks, of whom somewhat less than a third are women. At the Civil War, Uncle Sam did not employ a single one of his daughters in his gi-associates. He sent for Jennie Douglas, and placed her at a table piled high with sheets of legal tender notes, a pair of shears on top of them. At the next table was a young man, one of the few department trimmers left. "Now, Miss Douglas," General Spinner said, "cut your sheets of money just as you see this man do, and see how you can make out with the work." By night she had "made out" so well with her nimble fingers that, although it was her first day, she had done a third more than the man clerk, and by the end of the week she was trimming just twice as many as he was. The next week seven other women were put to work with her. That was in 1861; to-day there are 2,500 women among the 5,000 clerks employed in the Treasury. This bureau has always retained more women clerks than any other; but they are now to be found in all of the departments.

The army of scrub-women, who in the dim light of dawn scurry through the streets of Washington and go in at the lower doors of the massive, silent government buildings, where, on their hands and knees, they wash up the acres and acres of tiled flooring, receive the smallest pay of any of Uncle Sam's workers—from $20 to $40 a month. Another army of women hurrying through the same doors a few hours later, go into rooms where they mend mail-bags, feed printing presses paste papers, etc. Their pay is from $40 to $60 every thirty days. Above them, come the largest army of all—the clerical force, who begin work at nine and stop at four, and whose salaries range from $500 to $2,500 annually. While there are two or three who are paid even higher than the last-named sum, the average salary is $800 to $1,000.

Of all of the women in Government employ, there is none, perhaps, whose position yields as much happiness to as many persons as that of Miss Etta Josselyn Giffin, Superintendent of the Pavilion of the Blind at the Library of Congress. This department for the blind, a unique feature in libraries when it became a part of the Congressional, owed its existence to a blind girl, who, conceiving the idea of a room set aside in the new building exclusively for the use of others afflicted like herself, went to the late Mr. John Russell Young, then Librarian, and told him her plan. He entered into it heartily; the present handsome room in the northwest corner of the building was appropriated; books for the blind were collected there; a piano, music, and games were provided, and Miss Giffin was placed in charge. "Sometimes I think that God made her just for us," is the blind girl's tribute to the Superintendent. Miss Giffin has broadened the scope of the pavilion in many ways since its establishment. Nearly all of the weekly and monthly publications for the sightless are on the tables. Mr. Hutchinson, the Assistant Librarian, put his typewriter at Miss Giffin's disposal, and a number of the blind have learned to use it. She has placed a glass case in the room, where the blind put on sale specimens of their handicraft. From October to June, literary and musical entertainments are provided.

Another young woman whose position under Uncle Sam is a blessing to others, as well as herself, is Miss Estelle Reel, Superintendent of our Government Indian Schools. Miss Reel commenced teaching in the city schools of Cheyenne, and rose successively from a grade teacher to Principal, County Superintendent and State Superintendent, from which position President McKinley, in 1898, elevated her to that of Superintendent of the Government Indian Schools. It was the first time that a woman had ever held this position and there were many to foretell her failure, but her decided success has proven them all false prophets. She has inaugurated some new methods of which time is proving the wisdom. She believes firmly that industrial training is the hope of the red race, and she has established it in all of the schools. A large farm is conducted in connection with each of the boys' schools, where, in addition to their book studies, the pupils are taught practical and intelligent farming. A thorough knowledge of dairying and stock-raising is given, and elementary instruction in blacksmithing, carpentry, harness and shoemaking. The girls are taught, beside their regular lessons, cooking, sewing, nursing, sanitary housekeeping, and the practical management of a household. But with these things she encourages them to preserve and develop their beautiful native arts, basketry, pottery, bead-work, blanket-making, and so forth, as it opens up an important avenue of self-support for them.

During the recent Spanish war, a new position was established for women in the War Department, that of the Superintendent of the Army Corps of Nurses. Dr. Anita McGee filled the place temporarily, but when the Army Reorganization Bill became a law last winter, the position was made a permanent one of the bureau, and put in charge of Mrs. Ida Kinney, who had given evidence of her fitness by her efficient services in the volunteer hospitals during the Spanish troubles. Her present duties are under the direction of Surgeon-General Sternberg of the Army. She has the immediate charge of all the female nurses of the corps. In the home hospitals, these nurses are paid from $40 to $65 a month, and their rations; in the Philippines, they are paid from $50 to $75 and rations. All applications to join the corps are referred to Mrs. Kinney; she looks up the credentials, conducts the examination, and passes upon the suitability of the applicant.

Among the large number of women at the Treasury there are several who occupy expert positions. Their long service and skill make them invaluable to the Government. Mrs. W. A. Leonard and Mrs. A. E. Brown, of the Redemptive Division, are often termed "Uncle Sam's blind counters." Mrs. Leonard's work is to detect counterfeit money, and so trained is her sense of touch, that the moment she puts her fingers on a piece of "green goods," she recognizes it. Mrs. Brown is the burnt and mutilated money expert. No matter how badly a bill may have been damaged, if there is a recognizable remnant left, the Treasury will redeem it. When these remnants are sent in, they are turned over to Mrs. Brown, and it is wonderful what she can do. Somebody out in Ohio, one day, put his wallet, with several hundred dollar bills, in the oven of an unused stove. For some reason, his wife built a fire in the stove, and when the man thought of his wallet it was baked to a crisp, and so were the bills. He posted it off to the Treasury, where it went to Mrs. Brown, who, by floating the ashy particles on the surface of water, identified every bill.

garb work-shop. When that conflict came on, armies, North and South, drew recruits from the departments, and Government officials were at their wits' end to find persons to fill vacant places. When General Spinner, who served with so much distinction as United States Treasurer from 1861-75, was installed, he and the work in the bureau appallingly in years, and one day horrified his colleagues by announcing that he intended to put some women clerks. Women! What courtesy do? His colleagues really wanted to be enlightened. At that time the work of trimming legal tender notes was done by hand with a long pair of shears which cut across a sheet of four bills at one stroke. There were no young men to do this trimming as formerly, and the work had to be done. "I believe that women can do it. I shall make the experiment and see if they can, at any rate," said the General to his sceptical knowledge of the law. She is Miss Clara Greacen, of Minnesota. She came to Washington from her Western home seven years ago, and got a position in the Treasury as type-writer at $700 a year. She did her work excellently, and her opportunity came. She was promoted to Controller Tracewell's division, where she saw that a knowledge of law would be of much benefit to her, upon which she commenced attending the night classes of a law school; keeping this up for years until she had taken an A.M. and LL.B. degree. When Controller Tracewell learned of her attainments, he began to place opinions in her hands to write, and she did these so well that when a vacancy occurred, among the lawyers of the division last spring, at Controller Tracewell's suggestion, Secretary Gage named her for the position, which she holds at the snug salary of $1,800 annually.

THE BIBLE CLASS IN THE WORKSHOP

THE power of the shop Bible Class, as a practical factor for good, is becoming more and more recognized with each year. The co-operation of factory managements, in the large cities in particular, and the attentiveness of the laborers, has abundantly encouraged those who are at work in this special field. In this connection, facts and figures combine to tell an interesting and a gratifying story.

In Cleveland, which is the metropolis of Ohio according to the last census, this work is being satisfactorily carried on under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. Into the car barns and industrial institutions a fifteen-minute religious programme has been carried at the noon time, but not without the hearty consent of the employers. Courses of study have been judiciously introduced, appealing to a latent desire for education, while music has touched many a sympathetic chord.

Noonings in the big shops of Cleveland comprise but a half hour. To use to the best advantage the time which remains after the men have finished their lunch requires good judgment, and some knowledge of how to deal with men. The programmes have been varied in different shops. Some of the meetings have been devoted wholly to music. The co-operation of the employers has been demonstrated at the Twist Drill Works and the National Carbon Works by their purchase of an organ in each instance. The appreciation of the employees has been evidenced by the strong choruses in the audiences.

A feature of the work worthy of particular mention is found in the courses of study, which are arranged in series of twelve weeks each. Each employee is presented with a Testament at the beginning of the first series. Topic cards are next distributed, on which are printed not only the subjects, but also Bible references suitable thereto. The noon gathering each week then takes the form of dled, and where trains for the furnace districts are made up. The street car men in the majority of cities, probably more than any other class of workers, know little of what it is to have a quiet and a restful Sunday.

The following figures, compiled by the Young Men's Christian Association, show the attendance at the series of lessons for one year in the various shops where the work is being carried on in Cleveland: National Carbon Works, 6,275; Cleveland Twist Drill Works, 5,043; Taylor-Bris Foundry, 2,889; Lorain Street car barns, 1,144; Madison Avenue car barns, 760; Woodland Avenue car barns, 72; The Chisholm-Moore Company, 931; The Chandler-Ice Company, 135; The Pennsylvania railroad car shop, 2,251; The Lindale car shop, 2,061; the Lake Shore railroad machine shop, 4,728; the Lake Shore railroad blacksmith shop, 1,630; the Lake Shore railroad mill-room, 3,346. The total for all the shops and street car barns is 32,104.

For skilled work, two of Uncle Sam's daughters in the dead letter office of the Post Office Department should perhaps be awarded the palm. They are Superintendent Collins and her associate, Miss Caroline Childs, who decipher the addresses on the missent mail. Last year 6,500,000 pieces of mail were sent to Mrs. Collins' dead letter division to be re-directed, returned to the owner, or, where that was not possible, turned over to the Government; 2,200 letters and parcels are received in this office every day in the week; last year 90,000 pieces were received with insufficient postage; 35,000 with no address whatever. In these letters there were forty thousand dollars in money, and almost a million dollars in drafts, checks, and money orders. All postmasters in our 75,000 post offices send all illegible, misdirected and blank envelopes to the Dead Letter Office at Washington, and the facility with which Mrs. Collins and Miss Childs can decipher them is almost beyond belief. The slightest clew, an association of an idea, a phonetic spelling, or a probable location, will enable them to discern the letter's intended destination. It is something of a joke on the cautious business men of the country that two-thirds of the letters without any address whatever are from them, and that in nine cases out of ten they contain checks or drafts. Deciphering these missent letters is not a matter of intuition with Mrs. Collins or Miss Childs; their knowledge of location is world-wide. Every prominent street and hotel in America and Europe is familiar to them; they know every foreign settlement in the United States; they have the addresses of all public men. Their skill is the fruit of hard work and study.

In the State Department is a little woman who has accomplished what had baffled a dozen of men. The Spanish war, and an enlarged territory increased the work of this bureau tremendously, and unrecorded correspondence was piling up in the state closets. When Secretary Day came in his state of affairs staggered him, and he sent to a book type-printing company and asked them to detail a clerk who could reduce the chaos to order. Miss Mary Greer came and by the time she had finished her appointed task officials had discovered she was a valuable clerk to lose, and retained her permanently. Across the street from the Department of State is the Bureau of American Republics, which manages the business relations between the United States and its Southern neighbors. Expert translators are in demand in that bureau. Two of its young women clerks, Miss Kirk and Miss McNaughton, have such marked efficiency in this respect that they draw salaries of $500 each annually. Each has at command six or seven languages. Miss McNaughton was sent as a translator to Paris with the Portuguese, translator in any of the duties.

ABBY G. BAKE

A PERSECUTOR CONVERTED

COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER of the Salvation Army lately received from Colonel Murani, who is in charge of the Army's work in Gujerat, India, a letter, which gives the sequel to a very remarkable story of persecution and suffering of native Christians by the high caste. The letter says:

"You will remember, some years ago, the beautiful corps we had at Vishrampur, and the persecution which broke out against our people by the high caste. The Salvation Army endeavored to help our soldiers and take out a case against the high caste people, which, unfortunately, because it was a Gaekwari village and tried in a native State Court, was given against us. In consequence of the great persecution, which intensified and increased when the case was given against the Army, it was thought wise to remove our officers from the corps, and the poor hapless soldiers were left to themselves.

"Yesterday, when in Anand, a high caste man came to see me. He was from Vishrampur, and inquired all over Anand where I might be found. He told us that he was the mooki of the village at the time of the persecution, and that he was the chief instigator of it, and had himself so beaten and severely ill-treated our people that he said that God had deeply punished him. 'The people we persecuted,' he said, 'have gone forward and prospered, but we have had to go through the deep waters of affliction. God has punished me by making me very ill for six months, and in that sickness I became very sorry for the way I acted against God's people, and told the Lord that if He would only make me well, I would come to you and entreat you to forgive me. I can neither eat or drink until you have told me that you have forgiven me fully, and will count me amongst your people.' Over and over again, with the deepest emotion, he entreated our forgiveness. 'Other people live for this world, but you people only live for the next world,' he said. 'Their thoughts and ideas and motives are different from my body else's.' He informed us that he has given up entirely the worship of idols, and the wearing of caste marks, and that he had a Bible, which he had evidently been reading very carefully. He entreated us to send the Salvation Army back to Vishrampur to instruct and improve the people. Thus you hear of the fruit of your labors after many days.

THE HIDDEN THING

COMMENT ran freely from mouth to mouth in Greenville the morning after old Moore died; but no one was surprised that he had left his money, and the beautiful place just outside the town, "Beechwood," to his old friend and adviser, Frederick Pomeroy.

Paul Nelson Moore, the wealthiest man in that thriving Western town, had accumulated a modest fortune, and when, six years previous, he had driven his only son and child from home, and openly threatened to disinherit him for marrying a beautiful mill-girl of a neighboring village, Greenville had a sensation that lasted for many a day. The old man made no secret of his determination in the matter, and all Greenville had long known that Frederick Pomeroy, the leading lawyer of the town, was to come into the inheritance.

"Pomeroy, I congratulate you," said John Taylor, one of the most prominent church workers, the next morning. "I hear you were with Mr. Moore shortly before he died. Did he—ah, now any change about anything?"

Taylor and Pomeroy were old friends, and a personal question like this was not uncommon between the two if occasion offered. Pomeroy understood the allusion perfectly. He shook his head as he lit a cigar.

"Oh, John," he said. "He sent for me to consult regarding that Simonson farm; you know he always was uncertain about the title. He died while we were talking."

Twenty years later, Greenville, now a thriving suburb of the not-far-distant great city, had improved wonderfully. Much of the improvement was due to Frederick Pomeroy, who, since he had taken possession of "Beechwood," had advanced until now he was the most prominent citizen of Greenville. His law practice had for some time acquired an office in the city; he had bought the town library; had led in the up-to-date beautifying of the town with its parks and picnic grounds; twice he had been mayor; he had contributed liberally to every public enterprise, and, though not a church member, he headed the list with a generous subscription. Corinne, the lovely daughter who had been left to him by his wife only a few days before his patron died, had developed into a beautiful and attractive girl, who was an active church worker and a teacher in the Sunday School. She was beloved by all who knew her, and her father literally worshipped her.

On one fine morning, John Taylor called into Pomeroy's office. "Frederick," he said, with the familiarity of an old friend, "I have news for you."

"Lead, John! What is it like?"

"The Rev. Paul Nelson Moore, grandfather of your deceased friend, is coming here. He has been assigned by Conference to our church. Isn't that a stranger situation? Here is a disinherited heir of a great estate, who has never even been heard of before, sent to be the pastor of a church in the very town where his grandfather lived and died. Will you receive him at 'Beechwood,' Fred?"

Frederick Pomeroy had seemed quite startled by the news for a moment; then he smiled easily in his chair and replied:

"It's an odd thing, surely, but strange things happen in this world. He will be welcome at 'Beechwood,' if he chooses to come; but I suppose he will resent the fact that it is not his."

A month later, Greenville was beginning to recover from the excitement caused by the arrival of the new minister, with its accompanying sensation. Gossip had naturally run riot for some days, but the Rev. Paul Moore bore himself with so much dignity, and took such effective measures to set foolish rumors at rest, that it had soon died out. Everyone knew now that he bore no resentment for his disinheritance; that he was sincerely devoted to his work. It was now more than whispered that the young minister and Corinne Pomeroy had been attracted to each other from the first, and speculation as to the result of Corinne's solicitation, Frederick Pomeroy had called on the new pastor and had invited him to "Beechwood," an invitation which had been promptly accepted.

No one knew that the night after the young minister called on "Beechwood" on his first call, that Frederick Pomeroy had walked the floor most of the night, divided by the strange and conflicting situation in which he found himself, but—whatever it was—he kept it to himself.

The months slipped by until almost a year had elapsed since Rev. Paul Moore came to Greenville. It was now an accepted fact by everyone that he was deeply in love with Corinne Pomeroy; but as the engagement was not announced the gossips once more had it their own way, and now it was said that pride kept him from declaring himself. For once the gossips were right, and no people in the wide world knew the exact truth better than both Frederick Pomeroy and his beautiful daughter, though no word had passed between them on the subject.

Matters stood thus when quietly but with great power, a revival spread in the church under the young minister's fervent admonitions. Fanned in several weeks by increasing eloquence, fervor and the conversion of many, it rose to a height never before known in that congregation.

"I think," said Corinne to Paul, as they walked home one evening after the services, "that father is under chair. In that hour, the conviction of sin that had for many days been eating its way into his soul, became complete. But with subtle reasoning he finally quieted his conscience. "He loves her," he thought, "and he is a noble man, well worthy of her. I will encourage the outcome, and by leaving 'Beechwood' to them I will make it all right." The next day he felt as if he had once more regained his old self-control, and, strong in himself, he accompanied Corinne to the church. Moved by some strange and uncontrollable impulse, Paul Moore, instead of delivering the carefully prepared discourse over which he had worked and prayed all day, had an irresistible inspiration to preach from the text, "For God shall bring every work into judgment with every hidden thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil," and from those poignant words he gathered force as he proceeded, until it seemed as if any one with a hidden sin must stand up and cry aloud. He called upon all, even professing Christians, to beware of concealing sins, and with power and vivid word painting he pictured the Last Day. "God will not forgive a living lie!" was the keynote and the last word.

Frederick Pomeroy felt his heart melt within him. He arose and stepped into the aisle, but John Taylor, seeing his pale face, said: "What is the matter? Are you ill?" The impossibility of confessing to his old friends rushed over him again. "The air is stifling in here," he replied. "I am going home."

How he lived through that night and the next day he did not afterward clearly remember. He had declined to accompany Corinne to the service. Alone with his thoughts he paced the floor, while the storm of rain increased outside. Like a scroll, the twenty years that had elapsed since that memorable night when old Paul Moore died unrolled before him. Again he heard the words of the dying man, again he saw the shaking hand steadied while it traced the last signature. Then he saw himself, cool and collected, standing by the dead man's bed, calling in the servants, giving orders—was he not master there? He brushed his hand across his brow and tried to believe it all a dream. Then, as a sudden gust of rain blew against the window, a sentence sounded as though shouted in his ear: "God will not forgive a living lie;" and that was succeeded by another, Corinne's last words as she left the house that evening: "Papa, I'm praying for you." They alternated and repeated. "I'll do it," he said aloud, throwing out his hands. He went to the desk, drew out from a secret drawer an old and carefully preserved document and hastened from the house.

The service was being concluded as he entered the church and made his way up the crowded aisle. At the door his hat had blown off, and his hair and clothing glistened with the now freezing raindrops. There was that in his appearance of a man arriving at a desperate crisis; but there was no time for more than a thrill of surprise before he reached the steps of the pulpit, and, speaking in a loud and clear voice, said:

"My friends, if I dare to call you so, I am here to confess a crime. Twenty years ago your fellow-townsmen, Paul Moore, the grandfather of your pastor, died. He had some time before disinherited his son and made me his heir. Perhaps no one but myself ever knew that he never really ceased to love him, and that his heart constantly reproached him for what he had done. When in his last illness, he was told by his physician that he had but a few hours more in which to live, he sent for me and asked me to draw up another will, in which everything was to be left unconditionally to his son. I did so; he made me his sole executor, adjured me to find the boy and restore his own to him, and barely had time to affix his signature to the new will, when he gasped and died. I yielded to the temptation that possessed me in that hour, kept the will, and made myself the owner of 'Beechwood.' Since then I have lived among you, and have received honors at your hand, honors which I did not deserve; and I stand here before you, a disgraced but repentant man. My crime has found me out; God has spoken to my soul, and though I have been a living lie among you for twenty years I will be so no longer. This hidden sin, which was so easy to commit and so easy to conceal, has become too great a burden to bear. For a long time, yes, for all these years, I have been its conviction, but I cannot tell. He has acted rather strangely of late, and I am sure that he has something on his mind. He stays up very late every night. See! He is walking up and down in the library now. Come in and see him, won't you. He is always glad to see you, and perhaps you can bring him out of this restless mood."

In the warm, glowing room, Frederick Pomeroy gave him a cordial greeting. The walls lined with books, the intellectual calibre of his host, his wide experience of men and affairs made him a delightful conversationalist. The young pastor avoided forcing religious matters on him until, as he rose to go, he held out his hand and said: "Mr. Pomeroy, I shall be very happy to see you at the service to-morrow night. I have missed you for several evenings. I think that even as a student of human phenomena you could not fail to be interested in seeing how completely changed a number whom you know are. And you, yourself?"—he paused, evidently feeling some deep emotion, then, with a little tremor in his voice, he added: "We need you in the church, brother. God bless you. Good night." He gave his hand a sudden tight grip and was gone.

Frederick Pomeroy, dazed, sank into a great arm-

PAUL in the Basket

TEXT—II. Cor. II: 33:

Through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall

SERMONS on Paul in jail, Paul on Mars Hill, Paul in the shipwreck, Paul before the Sanhedrim, Paul before Felix are plentiful, but in my text we have Paul in a basket.

Damascus is a city of white and glistening architecture, sometimes called "the eye of the East," sometimes called "a pearl surrounded by emeralds," at one time distinguished for swords of the best material called Damascus blades, and upholstery of richest fabric called damask. A horseman by the name of Saul, riding toward this city, had been thrown from the saddle. The horse had dropped under a flash from the sky, which at the same time was so bright it blinded the rider for many days, and, I think, so permanently injured his eyesight that this defect of vision became the thorn in the flesh he afterward speaks of. He started for Damascus to butcher Christians, but after that hard fall from his horse he was a changed man, and preached Christ in Damascus till the city was shaken to its foundation.

The mayor gives authority for his arrest, and the popular cry is: "Kill him! kill him!" The city is surrounded by a high wall, and the gates are watched by the police lest the Cilician preacher escape. Many of the houses are built on the wall, and their balconies projected clear over and hovered above the gardens outside. It was customary to lower baskets out of these balconies and pull up fruits and flowers from the gardens. To this day visitors at the monastery of Mount Sinai are lifted and let down in baskets. Detectives prowled around from house to house looking for Paul, but his friends hid him, now in one place, now in another. He is no coward, as fifty incidents in his life demonstrate, but he feels and he evades assassination. "Is that preacher here?" the foaming mob shout at one house door. The emergency was terrible. Provisionally there was a good stout basket in the house. Paul's friends fasten a rope to the basket. Paul steps into it. The basket is lifted to the edge of the balcony on the wall, and then while Paul holds the rope with both hands his friends lower away, carefully and cautiously, slowly but surely, further down and further down, until the basket strikes the earth and the apostle steps out, and afoot and alone starts on that famous missionary tour, the story of which has astonished earth and heaven. Appropriate entry in Paul's diary of travels: "Through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall."

I observe, first, on what a slender tenure great results hang. The ropemaker who twisted that cord fastened to that lowering basket, never knew how much would depend upon the strength of it. How if it had been broken, and the apostle's life had been dashed out? What would have become of the Christian Church? All that magnificent missionary work in Pamphilia, Cappadocia, Galatia, Macedonia, would never have been accomplished. All his writings, that make up so indispensable and enchanting a part of the New Testament, would never have been written. The story of resurrection would never have been so gloriously told as he told it. That example of heroic and triumphant endurance at Philippi, in the Mediterranean Euroclydon, under flagellation, and at his beheading, would not have kindled the courage of ten thousand martyrs. But that rope holding that basket, how much depended on it! So again and again great results have hung on slender circumstances.

The Lawgiver in Peril

Did ever ship of many thousand tons crossing the sea have such an important passenger, as had once a boat of leaves, from taffrail to stern only three or four feet, the vessel made water-proof by a coat of bitumen, and floating on the Nile with the infant lawgiver of the Jews on board? What if some crocodile should crunch it? What if some of the cattle wading in for a drink should sink it? Vessels of war sometimes carry forty guns looking through the port-holes, ready to open battle. But the tiny craft on the Nile seems to be armed with all the guns of thunder that bombarded Sinai at the lawgiving. On how fragile craft sailed how much of historical importance!

The parsonage at Epworth, England, is on fire in the night, and the father rushed through the hallway for the rescue of his children. Seven children are out and safe on the ground, but one remains in the consuming building. That one awakes, and finding his bed on fire and the building crumbling, comes to the window, and two peasants make a ladder of their bodies, one peasant standing on the shoulder of the other, and down the human ladder the boy descends—John Wesley. If you would know how much depended on that ladder of peasants, ask the millions of Methodists on both sides of the sea. Ask their mission stations all around the world. Ask their hundreds of thousands already ascended to join their founder, who would have perished but for the living stairs of peasants' shoulders.

An English ship stopped at Pitcairn Island, and right in the midst of surrounding cannibalism and squalor, the passengers discovered and schools and beautiful homes, and highest style of religion and civilization. For fifty years no missionary and no Christian influence had landed there. Why this oasis of light amid a desert of heathendom? Sixty years before, a ship had met disaster, and one of the sailors, unable to save anything else, went to his trunk and took out a Bible which his mother had placed there, and swam ashore, the Bible held in his teeth. The book was read on all sides, until the rough and vicious population were evangelized, and a church was started, and an enlightened commonwealth established; and the world's history has no more brilliant page than that which tells of the transformation of a nation by one book. It did not seem of much importance whether the sailor continued to hold the book in his teeth, or let it fall in the breakers, but upon what small circumstance depended what mighty results!

Practical inference: There are no insignificances in life. The minutest thing is part of a magnitude. Infinity is made up of infinitesimals; great things an aggregation of small things. Bethlehem manger pulling on a star in the eastern sky. One book in a drenched sailor's mouth the evangelization of a multitude. One boat of papyrus on the Nile freighted with events for all ages. The fate of Christendom in a basket let down from a window on the wall. What you do, do well. If you make a rope, make it strong and true, for you know not how much may depend on your workmanship. If you fashion a boat, let it be water-proof, for you know not who may sail in it. If you put a Bible in the trunk of your boy as he goes from home, let it be remembered in your prayers, for it may have a mission as far-reaching as the book which the sailor carried in his teeth to the Pitcairn beach. The plainest man's life is an island between two eternities—eternity past rippling against his shoulders, eternity to come touching his brow. The casual, the accidental, that which merely happened so, are parts of a great plan, and the rope that lets the fugitive apostle from the Damascus wall is the cable that holds to its mooring the ship of the Church in the storm of the centuries.

Unrecognized Service

Again, notice unrecognized and unrecorded service. Who spun that rope? Who tied it to the basket? Who steadied the illustrious preacher as he stepped into it? Who relaxed not a muscle of the arm or dismissed an anxious look from his face until the basket touched the ground and discharged its magnificent cargo? Not one of their names has come to us; but there was no work done that day in Damascus or in all the earth compared with the importance of their work. What if they had, in their agitation, tied a knot that could slip? What if the sound of the mob at the door had led them to say: "Paul must take care of himself, and we will take care of ourselves." No, no! They held the rope, and in doing so did more for the Christian Church than any thousand of us will ever accomplish. But God knows, and has made record of their undertaking. And they know.

There are said to be about a hundred and fifty thousand ministers of religion in this country. About eighty thousand, I warrant, came from early homes which had to struggle for the necessities of life. The sons of rich bankers and merchants generally become bankers and merchants. The most of those who become ministers are the sons of those who had terrific struggle to get their every-day bread. The collegiate and theological education of that son took every luxury from the parental table for eight years. The other children were more scantily apparelled. The son at college every little while got a bundle from home. In it were the socks that mother had knit, sitting up late at night, her sight not as good as once it was. And there also were some delicacies from the sister's hand for the voracious appetite of a hungry student. The father swung the heavy cradle through the wheat, the sweat rolling from his chin bedewing every step of the way, and then sitting down under the cherry-tree at noon, thinking to himself: "I am fearfully tired, but it will pay if I can once see that boy through college, and if I can know that he will be preaching the Gospel after I am dead."

The younger children want to know why they have this and that, as others do, and the mother "Be patient, my children, until your brother graduates, and then you shall have more luxuries, but we must see that boy through."

The years go by, and the son has been ordained and is preaching the glorious Gospel, and a great reward comes, and souls by scores and hundreds accept the Gospel from the lips of that young preacher, and father and mother, quite old now, are visiting the son in the village parsonage, and, at the close of a Sabbath of mighty blessing, father and mother retire to their room, the son lighting the way and asking them if he can do anything to make them more comfortable, say, if they want anything in the night just to knock on the wall. And then, all alone, father and mother talk over the gracious influences of the day, and say: "What was worth all we went through to educate that boy."

Restraining Influences

O men and women, you brag sometimes how you have fought your way in the world, but I think there have been helpful influences that you have never fully acknowledged. Has there not been some influence in your early or present home that the world cannot see? Has there not reached you from among the New England hills, or from Western prairie, or from Southern plantation, or from English, or Scottish, or Irish home, a certain influence that has kept you right when you would have gone astray and which, after you had made a crooked track recalled you? Why not be frank and acknowledge it—the most of us would long ago have been dashed to pieces had not gracious and loving lips steadily, and lovingly, and mightily held the rope.

But there must come a time when we shall find out who these Damascuses were who lowered Paul in the basket, and greet them and all those who have rendered to God and the world unrecognized and unrecorded services. That is going to be one of the glad elements of heaven, the hunting up and picking out of those who did good on earth, and got no credit for it. You would not be guilty of the impoliteness of hanging friends in your parlor not introduced, and celestial politeness will demand that we be made acquainted with all the heavenly household. What rehearsal of old times and recital of stirring reminiscences!

Come, let us go right up and accost those on the circle of heavenly thrones. Surely, they must have killed in battle a million men. Surely, they must have been buried with all the cathedrals sounding a dirge, and all the towers of all the cities tolling the national dirge. Who art thou, mighty one of heaven? "I lived my choice the unmarried daughter in an humble home at I might take care of my parents in their old age, and I endured without complaint all their querulousness and administered to all their wants for twenty years." Let us pass on round.

The Circle of Thrones

Who art thou, mighty one of heaven? "I was a Christian invalid, and suffered all the while, occasionally writing a note of sympathy for those worse off than I, and was general confidant of all those who had trouble, and once in a while I was strong enough to make a garment for that poor family in the back lane." Pass on to another throne? Who art thou, mighty one of heaven? "I was the mother who raised a whole family of children for God, and they are out in the world Christian merchants, Christian mechanics, Christian wives, and I have had full reward for all my life." Let us pass on in the circle of thrones. "I had a bath School class, and they were always on my heart, and they all entered the kingdom of God, and I am waiting for their arrival."

Henceforth think of nothing as insignificant. Anything may decide your all. A Cunarder put out from England for New York. It was well equipped, but in putting up a stove in the pilot box, a nail was driven too near the compass. You know how that nail would affect the compass. The ship's officers, deceived by that distracted compass, put the ship two hundred miles off her right course, and suddenly the man on the lookout cried: "Land ho!" and the ship was within a few yards of her demolition on Nantuxet Shoals. A sixpenny nail came near wrecking a Cunarder. Small ropes hold mighty destinies.

Nothing unimportant in your life or mine. The noughts placed on the right side of the figure one make a thousand, and six noughts on the right side of the figure one, a million, and our nothingness placed on the right side may be augmentation illimitable. All the ages of time and eternity affected by the basket let down from a Damascus balcony.

THE • STORY • OF • YUEN • QUAI

In a Mission Home, in a city by the sea, looking out toward far-off Asia, sat a young girl, knowing that her days were numbered. Yuen Quai would cheerfully have lain down her young life, but for the longing desire to save her own countrywomen. She had learned of Christ. Into her life had entered the peace that passeth all understanding. If one doubted the transforming power of the Gospel, one had but to look into that beautiful Oriental face and see what the Gospel had done for the young and gifted Yuen Quai. And this is the story of the brief life; of the lovely Christian character, and of the triumphant death of one who belongs to a land whose millions are yet to hear of Christ.

Yuen Quai was never exactly a slave girl, but was rescued from what would have become a life of shame. She bore the name of Woon T'sun, for, like most of the Chinese girls, she had two names entirely unlike the family name accounting for one, and fancy apparently for the other. Woon T'sun was the name by which she was called in court, but after she became one of the inmates of the Mission Home she was called Yuen Quai. To us, for the present, she is Yuen Quai. This child of nine years was the last of a family of five children, who, with their mother, had died of consumption. The bills were heavy, and the father, broken-hearted, decided to return to China. One woman, Kum Mah, who was known as a keeper of a Chinese house of shame, demanded this attractive little girl, unless her father could pay the money he had borrowed. This he could not do, and the child was at last left in payment of the debt. Word came to the Mission Home that Woon T'sun was being sent to a house of ill-repute, but all attempts to rescue her proved futile. One Sabbath afternoon in the autumn of 1890, the door-bell of the Mission Home rung, and some one was there to tell that little Woon T'sun was still being sent by Kum Mah to a house where no child could be sent and remain pure. Miss Culbertson, the missionary, telephoned immediately for a policeman.

When they walked triumphantly into the Home, bringing the sobbing child. She had been taught that danger and death lurked within those walls. But she found neither, and soon, childlike, her sobs turned to smiles, for she found she was among friends. Henceforth we will know her as Yuen Quai, except in the courts, where the name was at once taken. Miss Culbertson was appointed the child's guardian.

Kum Mah applied to the court to have the letters of guardianship revoked, and to appoint her daughter, Mai Sing, as guardian. Then the battle began in earnest, and seventeen times was the case taken into court. The secular press, with strong editorials, laid the case before its readers. Public opinion was aroused as never before, though hundreds in the past had been brought to the Mission Home. The beauty of the child touched the hearts of all who saw her in court.

Kum Mah's flimsy pretenses, her impure face, her shameless defiance of right, were placed over against the honest fearlessness of the Christian missionary, while the beautiful child, with wide open eyes, looked on to see who would win the day, for on that decision rested her future, a future which she could but dimly grasp. The attorneys fought bravely, for on the one side was an enormous fee, on the other, right and justice.

The day of triumph came. The little one was finally given to the Mission.

As the years passed by, it became apparent to all that Yuen Quai belonged to a higher class than most of the girls with whom she came in contact. She assumed no air of superiority, but her presence was felt wherever she went. She soon became ambitious to become a scholar. She became the interpreter in the Home and in the courts. Quick as an electric flash she read the face and the motives of those who came to claim the rescued slave girls. One who saw much of her, said: "Yuen Quai had marvelous powers with all the household, and with her own people; she was most trustworthy and discreet. She was a quiet force in the court room, so sweet, modest and wise—a rare girl." Of all this, the girl herself seemed wholly unconscious. In the school she was also the interpreter, and when some Chinese girl misunderstood the teacher, and became sullen or defiant, Yuen Quai would explain the teacher's words in such sweet, gentle tones, that the turbulent spirit grew quiet, and the obdurate scholar yielded.

Yuen Quai was now a beautiful girl of eighteen, and life in its fullness lay before her. The missionary who had so bravely rescued her had passed "beyond the smiling and the weeping," and another, Miss Cameron, who had never heard the story of Christ's life and death. Others intuitively caught the spirit, and so Yuen Quai went daily about her duties, never dreaming how she was influencing those who saw in one of their own nationality what they had never seen before.

A Chinese merchant from another city saw her, loved her, and sought her hand in marriage. She consented to become his wife, but not yet could she leave the home that had done so much for her. There, a little longer must she remain, to aid those who were working for her people, a people as dear to her as were Esther's of old to her.

She never went forth as a bride. She was to know no other earthly home, for death, who ever loves a shining mark, chose her for its own. The bright spot upon the cheek and the shortened breath, plainly told Yuen Quai that she was following rapidly in the footsteps of nearly every member of her family. The physicians said it was not consumption. Yuen Quai listened quietly to their decisions, but when they left, said it would be but a little while and she would follow the others. None who saw her bright smile and helpful ways, could believe that she knew so well what lay just before. Her faith seemed to rob the grave, so dreaded ordinarily by all the Chinese, of all its terrors. Her one desire seemed to be not to add one sorrow or burden to Miss Cameron, but to aid her in saving her own people as long as life should last. Then, too, she seemed to feel, as earth was receding and heaven drawing nearer, that she must bring more souls into the kingdom of the Lord.

There came a day when a telephone message came from Fresno, urging Miss Cameron to hasten there to appear in court, regarding a rescued girl. If she went, Yuen Quai must accompany her to interpret.

Rain was falling in torrents, but neither of the noble women faltered. They reached there at night, with the fierce storm beating about them. The girl was saved, but Yuen Quai never rallied from that trip. Not one murmur was ever heard to pass her lips through all the weary days and nights of pain that followed. She realized more and more, while no one else would believe it, that the end was very near. Lying quietly in her room in the Home, with beautiful flowers on every side, flowers sent by the loving hands of her own countrywomen, she would suddenly open her large, thoughtful eyes, and ask some question regarding the life beyond, showing where her thoughts had been.

Her last morning on earth dawned bright and clear. The sun shone upon her face, seeming to illumine it for the grave, which for this Oriental Christian girl had no terror. The Mission family had assembled for morning prayers. Her constant attendant, Teen Fook, bent over her, only to learn that the heart had ceased beating, and Yuen Quai was with her Saviour in Paradise. Loving hearts mourned in silence; Chinese girls wept bitter tears over one whose very presence had been a benediction; Christian Chinese friends sent beautiful flowers, to which were added exquisite floral offerings by Americans, who had watched the unselfish life that had been laid down for others. Later, Christian ministers told in English and Chinese what Yuen Quai's unswerving faith in Christ had been to others, and of the heaven in which this Chinese girl was that day free from suffering. And then, loving hands bore her to her burial. The scoffer looking on would have said, "Why this waste? when her life might have been one of ease in the home to which he who longed to be her husband at once would have gladly taken her any day as his cherished bride." When "the leaves of the judgment book unfold" they may be able to tell that it was no waste. That brief life of nineteen years is not ended even on earth. The walls seem to echo her words; those who saw her daily life and knew that love to Christ was the mainspring of her life-work, have taken a step forward, and desire to emulate her virtues.

Is not "life worth living," if only to win such souls to Christ?
MRS. P. B. BROWNE.

YUEN QUAI IN NATIVE DRESS

had taken her place. Next to her devotion to her Master was Yuen Quai's love for this young missionary. On many a night she has gone into the dark alleys of Chinatown, keeping close beside Miss Cameron, while the policeman kept near them both. These two heroic ones feared no foe, for one common thought urged them onward—a human being was that night to be saved, or sent back into deeper darkness.

Once within the Home, the girl they rescued felt she had a friend, one of her own nationality. While Yuen Quai was thus working for others, her own Christ-life was rapidly developing. Her large brown eyes shone with a new light, and her face was illumined with the Christ-love as she told in choicest English what Christianity had done for her, what it might yet do for others

A Storm-Swept Negro Church

Recent heavy storms have so injured and dismantled the Bethel A. M. E. Church, of Kingston, N. Y., that it can no longer be used for religious work. It will have to be rebuilt throughout. This storm-swept church is one of the oldest in the district and has seen many vicissitudes. Its first pastor, Rev. Mr. Hutchins, was widely known as a negro preacher of power and did much toward strengthening and establishing the growing church. The ground upon which the building was erected, was the gift of a white friend of the colored race. The congregation is poor and needy, and will appreciate any aid in rebuilding the church. Any reader who may desire to help this struggling church through its present troubles, may address Rev. Mr. Matthews, pastor A. M. Church, Kingston, N. Y.

STILL THE SAME

THE same old sin, with sickening return;
The same desires, that burn and burn and burn;
She same weak yielding and familiar shame;
But oh, thank God! my Saviour is the same.

The same old failure, now for many years
Mocked with a feeble effort, fruitless tears;
The same excuses, impotent and lame;
But oh, praise God! for prayer is still the same.

The same old sorrow, keen to quicken woe
As when it first assailed me, long ago;
The same old hidden pangs without a name;
But oh, praise God! for heaven is still the same.

Heathen Africa's Cry Answered

A lady, who does not wish her name to be given, writes to this paper from Augusta, Mich:

"I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 26 a short article called 'A Cry from Heathen Africa,' in which Rev. R. Wodehouse, of Umtali, Rhodesia, Africa, said: 'At Beira, there are thousands without any one to tell them of God, and the Portuguese sell the poor natives cheap drinks. We are in immediate need of a colored evangelist here, and a small room which could be used as a church.' God helping me, I will do something towards sending a missionary to Beira, and erecting a mission house there. I enclose $12, which please forward to Rev. Mr. Wodehouse. I hope that the money may be quickly supplied to build a mission house and to send more than one missionary."

A Message From India

MANY tokens have reached us from India, showing the great love that has been awakened in the hearts of the people of that distant land by America's kindness during the famine. These messages have given to all who had a share in the work of famine relief a feeling of pleasure in the knowledge that their self-denial and loving solicitude were not unappreciated. This is natural and pardonable; for while it is the aim of all who serve the Master to do good for his sake, and without expectation of reward, it is pleasing to have their labors understood and acknowledged.

We print below an extract from a letter lately received from the Rev. W. H. Stephens, Treasurer of the Missionary Committee in India, in which he gives free expression to the general feeling among the people of India towards Christian America, which came to their rescue in the great crisis of the famine. This letter, from Mr. Stephens to Dr. Klopsch, is a personal message to every reader of this journal, and shows how precious and far-reaching has been the influence of their work for India. He writes:

"I cannot tell you how much I appreciate the privilege of having some little place in this great movement. This is one of the greatest philanthropic movements that the world has seen, and I consider it a great honor to have the humblest connection with it. I have very often thought of you and your great burden, and I earnestly pray that your own life may have an abundant share of the blessings that have come through you to others. To Indians, America is a far-off land, and even educated natives have a vague idea of it; but I consider that this CHRISTIAN HERALD movement has done more than any other thing to draw the love of India towards America. On this side of India, especially, where the work is better known, our standing as American missionaries is better than ever before, and many hearts and ears have been opened to us because of this movement.

"As important as the work of having these orphans is, yet I feel that this exhibition of Christian love, by a far-away people, is having an influence upon India of even more importance than the orphan work. This has been forcibly brought to me lately, as I have met some leaders of the native community and listened to their expressions of wonder that America should so concern herself about India. When England exerts herself to save India, they can understand that; but the attitude of America is inexplicable, considered in the light of Indian religion or philosophy. You have had great burdens with this work, and your soul must have been vexed very often; but what I have said concerning the good that has been accomplished is, I truly believe, far short of the facts."

This is truly a case in which the workers "builted better than they knew." Our scattered groups of God's children, when they sent out from every town, village and farm in this land, their gifts to India, with prayer and blessing, could not have dreamed that their humble efforts, united, would have formed an influence which was destined to turn multitudes to Christ and to affect the fate of a great nation. What a potent force consecrated effort exerts upon the world's affairs, has probably never been more strikingly illustrated than in this India work, which has already brought blessings upon all who were associated in it, and which, even now, is training upwards of five thousand children to become messengers of the Gospel of salvation to almost every tribe in India. It is a work whose influence will broaden and extend far into the coming generations, as a river gathers strength and volume on its way to the sea.

All the heathen that were about us saw these things, for they perceived that this work was wrought of our God. Neh. 6: 15.

Ex-Empress Frederick

IN plain black dress, and without the adornment of so much as one jewel, Ex-Empress Frederick appeared at Athens. She had been attending a wedding in the Grecian palace, and was about to return. Her face, while cheerful, had on it the signature of many sorrows, but they were conquered sorrows. What a life of wonderful solicitude she lived! And now her death has caused universal grief. The animosities that in other years pursued her have all ceased. Periodicals that had much of criticism, or mean suggestion in regard to her have printed whole columns of eulogium. What a pity that the praises came so late! Talented obituary and royal funeral cannot atone for unkindnesses done by voice or pen. She was a noble specimen of Christian womanhood. There was in her manner complete simplicity. There was no indication that she had been born in a palace, and had lived all her life in English and German palaces. On more than one occasion she had expressed her faith in Christianity, and in it she found her chief consolation when times of depreciation and bereavement came. She seemed to suffer uncomplainingly. We never heard of her making a bitter retort. What an example of purity of life to the thrones of Europe, was this daughter of a Queen, and wife of an Emperor!

Favor is deceitful and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised. Prov. 31: 30.

In the Matter of Public Conveniences

ONE observes occasionally how very lax the individual conscience is in the matter of public conveniences. A woman who is most careful to turn down the gas in her home, wastes it in a hotel; in a boarding-house, where many must depend on the ice-cooler, people take full glasses of water, drink a mouthful and throw the rest away. There is always an enormous and reckless consumption of water in our cities, and, in consequence, a very great addition to the burdens of taxpayers, and in times of water famine the danger of loss to all. May we not apply to ourselves the injunction, "Look not every man on his own things, but also on the things of others"?

Is China Beaten?

FROM the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Chairman of the Relief Committee at Tientsin, we have received by this week's mail, the proof of an article which sheds a most interesting light on present conditions in China. It says:

The impression prevails in Western lands that China is beaten, and is badly demoralized by her defeat and her humiliation. What, let us inquire, is China? Not the Empire of that name, which, as a whole, knows nothing of the presence of foreigners within her boundaries, and cares even less. If we take the two Provinces of Shansi, through which the Court passed to get to Si-Ngan-Fu, and that of Shensi, where the Court now is, we may arrive at a fair estimate of what China thinks about this whole business. In the latter province, the people are too much occupied in the industry of trying to keep from starving to death to attend to much else, except to contrive how to get rid on any terms of that Court which they never wanted with them. Its presence has been in no way a benefit, but a burden and an exasperation throughout. We gather from what filters through the opaque media environing the distant Ch'ang An that, so far as foreign armies go, those who have the ear of the Empress-Dowager feel themselves quite secure in the remote fastness. There was a time when deep dread filled every heart. This was also the case in Shansi. In the month of October, a very small foreign force could have penetrated the Ku Kuan Passes, for the mere mention of their name diffused a pallor over every cheek. Now, after all these months, the Chinese soldiers and generals have had time to regain their breath after a protracted flight altogether, and they have entrenched themselves along a line hundreds of li in length, and are grown bold with the success of negative defiance. They have succeeded in so defending the long and difficult route, as to make the advance of Western troops difficult, and, as they think, totally impracticable. According to the reports of trustworthy native Christians recently from Shansi, there are some tens of thousands of Hunanese soldiers, under the command of a son of Liu K'un-yi, strongly posted throughout the pass from Ping T'ing Chou in Shansi, to within a short distance of the French outposts at Huai Su Hsien in Chihli, at the very gate of the T'ai Hang mountains. Other Chinese just from Si Ngan-Fu state that the Imperial highway leading thither from Tung Kuan, near the crossing of the Yellow River, via the great road from Shansi, is everywhere intersected at brief intervals with pits like those used in Fukien to entrap tigers, covered with sorghum stalks upon which is a layer of earth.

The essential point to be noted is that the Chinese semi-Bourbon has forgotten everything, and has learned nothing.

There has been only one period during many years when the Chinese Court has not been engaged in playing Power against another that China might escape. The number of "Powers" is enlarged, the difficulties increased, geometrical ratio, and by the time there are eight armies, eleven legations to deal with the friction is so multiplied that motion practically ceases. This we have all along, and the Chinese have all along hoped for. Now, they are sure of it, and so, too, are we. It would be contrary to the uniformity of nature if this incontestable and vital fact did not make incurable the chronic amaurosis of the Chinese political eye. They are saved by the dissensions of the Powers.

This, written in April last, would now seem to have been almost prophetic. The foreign armies are rapidly withdrawing, and China is resuming control over the ancient empire. The Boxers are gone, for the time at least; to be recreated and placed in the field again whenever "high political necessity," in the opinion of the Dowager-Empress or some other equally influential personage, shall make it desirable to curb the progress in China, and to worry or even to unsettle the ruling power. And meanwhile, oblivious of all that has come and gone during the last two years, or even since the battle of the Yalu, the great yellow race, 300,000,000 strong, goes on its ancient way, blindly and stumblingly clinging to its ancient gods, its world-old customs and traditions and its fatuous policy of national exclusiveness.

The united armies of the "civilized powers" have not "beaten" China. They have barely carried a few posts. A year hence, the influence of their invasion will have disappeared, and their visit will be well forgotten. But a deeper and more enduring impress upon the character and destiny of this strange nation, old as Egypt, is that which is being made by the Gospel of the Cross. Let the soldiers of the Cross take courage; with them lies the hope of China's future, and they can win, where all the brilliant military tactics and the weapons of human warfare have left hardly a trace.

Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, says the Lord of hosts. Zech. 4: 6.

What a Pity

IT must be a matter of world-wide regret, that the heroism and conduct of the Spanish-American war have been brought into bitter controversy. The hurt of Inquiry in the Schley-Sampson case may develop the real facts, but it will develop acerbities and jealousies which will be no illumination to the page of history. Alas, for the rivalries and injustices which may be discovered in all professions! Success always calls for belittlement from non-success. At the close of every war there comes a discussion as to who were the greater generals and admirals, and the question remains unsettled until, by the passage of time, the subject is obliterated. Concerning every prominent man there are two opinions. His friends see only his good points, his enemies see only his weak points. Let people in all kinds of service do their duty not expecting gratitude, for that is the rarest of graces.

Every man's work shall be made manifest; for then shall declare it. 1 Cor. 3: 13.

The Wonderful Story

See Colored Illustration on First Page

VERY touching and tender is the beautiful picture on our front page. Here are the two extremes of life—old age and early youth. And in both, the grandeur, venerable in the sweetness of four-score, and the little, sweet as a flower of the field, we see the gentleness of the child-heart. No gift is more precious, more divine than this. It is the sign manual of a right to heavenly treasure. It is the key of the kingdom of heaven, this trustful, reverent and believing heart of the child. They are talking, resting, listening, thinking, about the wonderful child who came from the sky, to bless and save the world. The old face tells of sorrows in the past, of trials overcome, of serenity as the answer to prayer. The childish face is smooth and serene. No questions, nor lines, nor troubles yet for the little inner in the race. Every face is either a history or a prophecy. What the life story shall be depends upon the way we approach the story of the Saviour's love. In any home, where youth and age alike turn daily to Jesus, and where the light is as a shining light, there will always be peace, rich and abiding.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Unknown Regions

THREE nations are now represented in the exploration of the huge section of the earth's surface which has never yet been penetrated by civilized man. Germany, England and Sweden are each sending an expedition to the Antarctic, in the hope of discovering the South Pole. This is a much less known region than the surrounding the North Pole. The nearest approach made to it is that of Borchgrevink, who, in an English ship, reached the latitude of 78 degrees, 50 minutes, which is 771 miles from the Pole. Previous to that record, the highest was that of James Ross, who, on an English vessel, discovered Victoria, the most southern part of land marked on our maps. It is an extraordinary region, in which are mountains of ice three hundred feet high, while in the very centre of the frozen land are volcanoes vomiting forth fire and lava. The map on this page shows how each nation is approaching this interesting problem. The German expedition sails in the Gauss, a vessel specially built for the voyage and provided by the government. It goes to Capetown in South Africa, and will enter the Antarctic Ocean from that side. The British expedition has sailed on the Discovery, the sixth vessel of that name fitted out for exploration. Its first destination is New Zealand and it will enter the Antarctic at a point almost exactly opposite to that of the Swedes, so that if we could imagine each vessel cutting its way at the same rate they would meet at the Pole. The Swedish expedition sails for South America in the Antarctic, a vessel which has already proved its fitness for the work by an expedition to Greenland. Her commander is Dr. Otto Nordenskjöld, a nephew of the famous Arctic explorer, who discovered the Northeast passage, and whose death last week is a grievous loss to the scientific world. It will be a remarkable coincidence if the nephew should achieve a triumph in the Antarctic, comparable to that of his late uncle in the Arctic. He hopes to reach the Antarctic Sea at the beginning of the winter, which will be the beginning of the summer in those regions, and to penetrate as far as the ice will permit. When the day begins to shorten he will retreat northward to spend the long night. The three expeditions are working in perfect friendliness and have made their plans after consultation with one another. Never was a geographical problem attacked with such thorough preparation. No expense has been spared to supply them with the best scientific apparatus, and with every known device for preserving life in the intense cold they must endure. Reports of the expeditions will be anticipated with the most intense interest, for no one has any conception of what will be found in that vast region, the area of which is more than three million square miles.

The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deeps frozen (Job 38: 30).

An Assailant's Punishment

The captain of a Canadian vessel tells a remarkable story of an attack by a whale on his ship during a voyage from Japan to Victoria, B. C. He says that early one morning the man at the wheel sighted an enormous whale, lying apparently asleep in the schooner's course. He called the captain, who ordered the ship's course changed so as to avoid the big fish. The matter, however, was seen to be moving, and it came directly toward the schooner. It came rapidly, as if in ragging its terrible tail. The sailors were afraid and tried to steer the vessel away from it, but the whale also changed its course, and made a dart at the bow. Its huge tail struck the stem of the vessel with a crash which stove in the upper part, and carried away a portion of the rigging. The sailors expected the whale to return and finish the destruction of the ship, but to their surprise, it dived and disappeared. The reason for its retreat was explained when the vessel reached the dock at Yokohama, where she went to repair the damage. The jagged ends of her broken timbers were coated with great pieces of the whale's flesh, showing that the blow must have injured the whale as much as it had injured the ship. Many a bullying man who, like the whale, has sought a conflict which his antagonist was trying to avoid, has had a similar experience, and it is always true, now as in the old times, that those who contend against God bring ruin on themselves. He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death (Prov. 8: 36).

A Sensitive Instrument

Among the new scientific inventions for which a patent has been secured, is one that the inventor calls the kryptophone. It was brought before the scientific world some years ago, but owing to some defects in construction it failed to fulfil the promises made for it. Since then it has been perfected to such a degree that it is now regarded as promising successful practical results in the line marked out by its inventor. In the make up of this peculiar apparatus, a very sensitive receiving diaphragm is so disposed that it will respond to and transmit air vibrations produced by any noise to a distant telephone, an alarm bell being provided at the receiving station to attract the attention of the attendant. The sensitivity of the device is said to be such that, with the receiving diaphragm immersed in a body of water, the pulsations of a steamboat from two to three miles distant are discernible, and other tests show its sensitive capacity in giving warning of noises at a distance. This is in line with the telescope, the telephone and other inventions. Man is always trying to extend the powers of his body and find aids for his senses. It is much to be wished that he would avail himself of the greatest of all such powers, the power of faith, by which he would perceive more than he can ever hope to see.

The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen (Rom. 1: 20).

The Cathedral's Broken Pillars

The Building Committee in charge of the erection of the Cathedral of St. John, in New York, is considering a request for the modification of a contract. The request comes from the firm who engaged to deliver the eight granite pillars required for the Cathedral nave. They were to be fifty-six feet high and six feet in diameter. The contractors constructed a lathe at a cost of fifty thousand dollars to reduce the rough stone to circular form. Two of the huge columns were taken out of the quarry, but were broken in applying the lathe to them. Each column weighed 175 tons, and it would have been necessary to cut away fifty tons to bring them to circular shape. The difficulty of handling masses of granite so gigantic is now believed to be insuperable, and the contractors now ask that each of the columns shall be composed of two pieces, twenty-eight feet long, otherwise they must abandon their contract. The concession will probably be made, for the Committee will recognize the difficulty there must be in shaping masses of granite so enormous into the size and form required. It is a very different process that is employed for perfecting the pillars in the heavenly temple, but they, too, must undergo preparation before they are fit for the place.

Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God (Rev. 3: 12).

Rescued His Own Son

A number of boys were playing on the Recreation Pier at North Second street, Brooklyn, on Wednesday of last week, when the cry was raised that one of them had fallen into the river. He was a little fellow only seven years old. It was a dangerous place to fall, for the water is deep and the current strong. One of the boys, with more presence of mind than the others, ran along the pier to the place where a policeman was on duty marshaling the boys who were going into the baths. He told the policeman of the accident, and the officer promptly ran to the place. Flung off his tunic and helmet, he dived into the river, and soon came up with the boy. Holding him by one hand and swimming with the other, he reached the pier and passed him up to the hands stretched out to take him. Then, to his astonishment, he recognized in the boy his own beloved child. The shock was so great that the policeman came near swooning, but his delight when the child recovered consciousness, was beautiful to see. How thankful he must have been that he was so prompt in the efforts he made to rescue the child! If Christians were as ready to go to the help of those who are in moral and spiritual danger, many more might be saved, and sometimes those who are very dear to the rescuer.

If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother (Matt. 18: 15).

BRIEF NOTES

Successful Tent Services have been held during the summer in St. Louis, Mo., by Rev. Charles Stelzle, formerly of New York.

Rev. F. B. Meyer has gone to attend a Conference of missionaries and Christian workers at Beyrouth, Syria. Mrs. Meyer accompanies him.

Mount Hermon School, which was the late D. L. Moody's cherished institution, opens its fall term August 30, with over four hundred students.

The crater of Vesuvius has been crumbling for some days, the height of the volcano has thus been reduced 1,200 feet. This may indicate a violent eruption shortly.

The George Junior Republic, at Freeville, N. Y., has done wonders in reforming bad boys. Of the one hundred and nineteen children who have left the Republic, many of whom were believed to be incorrigible, every one is now doing well in honest employment.

The sympathy displayed toward the Boers by Rev. Andrew Murray, of South Africa, may prove useful in promoting the interests of peace. General Botha has recently sent an urgent message to him, asking his good offices to procure another interview between Botha and Lord Kitchener.

The "look-out" members of the Chieng Sen Christian Endeavor Society, North Laos, Siam, have each undertaken to pray and work for some unsaved friend, with the result that the whole church has been stirred up.

The Buddhists are so impressed with the value of medical mission work, that they have bought a piece of land in Hakodate, and are going to build a large hospital for the poor; they propose to make no charge for attendance.

At a recent revival service at Stratford, Conn., a feud which has raged between well known residents for more than eight years, was healed. The chief persons, who have been suing one another in the courts, knelt together at the altar and prayed for God's blessing on the reconciliation.

At the annual convention of the Christian and Missionary Alliance at Old Orchard, Me., on Aug. 11, the sum of forty thousand dollars was contributed in response to the appeal of Rev. A. B. Simpson, the President. The cash given amounted to $125; there was a check for $5,000, and the remainder in pledges to be honored during the year.

A ship chartered by the Japanese residents of San Francisco, went down the bay on August 12 to the scene of the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro. There were 250 Japanese on board. When they reached the scene of the wreck, the head of the Buddhist Mission offered prayer, and then a large quantity of flowers, fruits and confections were scattered on the surface of the sea.

The eighty-fifth annual report of the American Bible Society, just issued, shows that last year, the total issues at home and abroad, amounted to 1,554,128 volumes; an increase of 147,327 over the previous year. Of these, 580,513 were distributed in the United States and 973,615 in foreign lands. Of the latter, 32,728 went to Mexico. During the history of the Society, it has received in gifts and bequests $30,605,390, and it has issued 98,223,434 copies and portions of the Bible.

Leaving the Old Home

JACOB AT BETHEL

 INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 8. GEN. 28: 10-22
 GOLDEN TEXT—SURELY THE LORD IS IN THIS PLACE. GEN. 28: 16

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

At this season, when from many homes boys are going away to school, and when from many more, boys who have recently completed their schooling are going away to start life for themselves, this story of Jacob leaving home may be made very timely. He was fifty-seven, but still a young, unmarried man, in an age when men lived centuries. He carried no property save the staff in his hand, in this like many of our most successful men, who had no capital to start with save energy and the blessing of God. Let us consider: 1. The cause of Jacob's sudden departure; 2. His vision of God; 3. His consecrated tithe.

To explain Jacob's flight we must recall his whole previous life. To Isaac and Rebecca were born twins, Esau and Jacob, in that order. The great honors that in the Orient always go to the first-born, therefore, belonged to Esau, and also the special covenant blessing God had given to Abraham and Isaac, the essence of which was that the holder of this covenant should be a blessing to the world. Esau "despised," while Jacob coveted, this birthright. Esau came in one day from hunting—his favorite occupation—weary and hungry, and found Jacob cooking a fragrant dish of red lentils, and cried out, "Feed me with that same red pottage, for I am faint." Jacob refused to part with it for anything less than the birthright. This future blessing Esau promptly consented to give up for the present gratification of the pea soup, and sealed his foolish bargain with an oath. But Isaac must also consent, or Esau's promise was vain. And Isaac preferred Esau "because he did eat of his venison," and because his own quiet temperament found strong gratification in the fellowship of one of opposite characteristics, bold and enthusiastic.

Esau, repudiating his bargain and his oath, joined with his father in a plan to keep the birthright blessing and have it sealed to him forever. He was first to make a hunters' feast. While he was hunting game for this, the mother, Rebecca, who favored Jacob, conceived a plan to deceive her blind husband. She dressed Jacob in Esau's clothes, put kid's hair on his hands and neck (Esau was a "hairy man") and by these acted lies and spoken ones of Jacob, whose voice raised Isaac's suspicions, the blessing was secured for Jacob. Just too late Esau returned, to learn that he had been "supplanted." The blessing and birthright had become Jacob's irrevocably, and weeping Esau, who had "repented" of his pea soup bargain and attempted to repudiate it, found no way to escape the consequences (Heb. 12: 17). God would surely have forgiven him if he had been truly penitent; but it is strange that any one should suppose he was in a state of true repentance when he immediately planned to avenge himself by killing his brother, which was the reason Jacob left home, urged by his mother, who secured his father's consent on the plea that he would be marrying some heathen, as Esau had done, if he was not sent back to find a wife where Isaac had found one, among his relatives in Mesopotamia.

We must not pass the story of these contrasted boys and the exchanged birthright, without considering its manifest lessons for the youths of to-day. In any age or country the population, young and old, is made up of Abrahams, Isaacs, Jacobs and Esaus. There are a few heroic Abrahams, leaders who open new paths and hold up lofty ideals. There are many more quiet, harmless Isaacs, whose lives are made up of the round of daily duties faithfully done. There are also many Jacobs, in whose heart greed and God wrestle long before love to God and man prevails. Most numerous of all, especially among youth, are the Esaus, girls as well as boys, that will sell out their birthright of future health and happiness and heaven for almost any mess of pottage that will give them momentary gratification. Every day we see worse bargains than Esau's. For some momentary gratification one gives up such golden birthrights as character, reputation, and the favor of God. We may well group with Esau's, other bad bargains of history. Eden forfeited for the sake of the forbidden fruit; Joseph sold for twenty pieces of silver, and Christ for thirty; Demas forsaking Paul because he loved this present world more than duty; Ananias and Sapphira, who tried to buy a reputation for unbounded generosity, while at the same time greedily hiding a part of their property; the rich young ruler, who loved money so much that he refused the privilege of being one of the company of Jesus. A few years ago the daily press told the story of John Wilmuth, who in his minority was bequeathed a fortune, of which he was not to receive possession till he became of age. But before that, having become dissipated, he sold his future fortune for $50, which was speedily used for vicious indulgences.

"How far have you got in arithmetic?" said a visitor to a boy in a home he was visiting. "I have finished profit and loss. The sums are very hard, some of them, but I did them all." "I think I could give you one you could not do." "I doubt it; try me." "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Could you do that one?" Reverently the boy replied, "Nobody could do that one." Compared to self-respect and God's love all the wealth of the world is but a mess of pottage beside the birthright.

Jacob, though less self-indulgent than Esau, was also badly damaged with the sin of selfishness in another form. The prodigal and the miser are brothers, both sons of selfishness. Esau was the captive of appetite; Jacob very nearly the captive of greed, though struggling at times against his chain, which he was to break at last. There is a picture called "The Red Fisherman," that represents the devil fishing for men with coins, jewels, wines, crowns. Jacob played much around that hook. To the question, "Was Jacob a good man or a bad man?" we must therefore answer with the Scotch laddie: "He was whiles aye and whiles the ither, and whiles, it may be, it was ill to say whilk. Jacob had not yet fought out his battle. And because he wouldna get up and fecht manfully, God had to take him in hand." Instead of trusting God, Jacob sought to win the covenant blessing by a sharp bargain on his brother and by lying to his father.

Was Jacob a Good Man?

"BEHOLD A LADDER SET UP ON THE EARTH AND THE TOP OF IT REACHED TO HEAVEN"

The result was he was a fugitive for twenty years, and never ceased to suffer the consequences of his sin, even after it was forgiven. As he had deceived his father with the hairy disguise, he was himself to be deceived almost to heartbreak by Joseph's bloody coat. Many a would-be saint feels himself "half Jacob and half Esau," and to such it is encouraging that God could speak to Jacob, especially when he had deceived his father as well as defrauded his brother.

With all his faults, because there were noble aspirations in his soul, and a great destiny to be worked out, God followed him in his flight. Forty-eight miles he had fled northward from Beersheba in two or three days, no doubt avoiding traveled paths lest the swift Esau, who was hunting him, should overtake him. At a place afterward known as Bethel, at sunset, he lay down to sleep on a stone pillow, doubtless lonesome and homesick as well as weary. His thoughts had hitherto been of earth and of himself, but in a vision, heaven was opened and God revealed, and ever afterward his life was ennobled by the ideals and influences of these unseen realities. As he slept, he saw the front steps at hand of the palace of heaven—to this had the terraced hills about him been suddenly transformed—and up and down angels were passing, carrying up the prayers of men, bringing back the blessings of God.

This scene teaches: 1. That heaven is near and attainable; 2. That intercourse between heaven and earth is constantly maintained by angel ministries.

The story is also fruitful in suggestions of comfort in our places, as expressed in that song born of sorrow:

Though like a wanderer, daylight all gone,
Darkness be over me, my rest a stone;
Yet in my dreams I'd be, nearer my God to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

There let the way appear steps unto heaven;
All that thou sendest me, in mercy given,
Angels to beckon me, nearer my God to Thee,
Nearer to thee.

This significant scene is pictured in other less far-reaching poems, each of which bears some angelic message. Longfellow has a message for those whose souls smart like Jacob's, with a sense that their sorrows are due to their sins:

Saint Augustine! well hast thou said,
That of our vices we can frame
A ladder, if we will but tread
Beneath our feet each deed of shame!

We have not wings, we cannot soar;
But we have feet to scale and climb,
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.

The mighty pyramids of stone
That wedge-like cleave the desert airs,
When nearer seen, and better known,
Are but gigantic flights of stairs.

The distant mountains, that appear
Their solid bastions to the skies,
Are crossed by pathways, that appear
As we to higher levels rise.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

Dr. J. E. Holland also emphasizes the human side of stepping heavenward:

Heaven is not reached at a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise,
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

We rise by the things that are under our feet,
By what we have mastered in greed and gain,
By the pride deposed and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ill that we hourly meet.

But the profoundest interpretation of the ladder is in the words of Christ, (John 1: 9): "Hereafter ye shall see heaven opened and angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man." Christ, then, is the way to heaven through whom God comes near to man, and man comes near to God. The door is "the gate of heaven," and wherever it is truly set up, whether in stately temple or open field, there is "the house of God." Jesus in a cornfield with his twelve apostles entered the beautiful but Godless sanctuary of marble at hand and said, "In this place is greater than the temple." There can be no "house of God" where God is not. "What church is this?" said a stranger at the open door. "Christ Church." "Is he in?" the cordiality with which the stranger was welcomed in his name confirmed the solemn affirmative answer. A child of the sons, whose life had been but slightly touched by religion, looked into the open door of a Sunday School while teachers and scholars in subdued and solemn tones, were talking over the lesson. After a pause, the child, aloud, "Is this the way to heaven?" Teachers heard it, and it searched their hearts. Were they making the Sunday School the way to heaven by presenting a living Christ as the only Way?

Beyond the stars that shine in golden glow
Beyond the calm, sweet moon,
Up the bright ladder saints have trod before thee,
Soul, thou shalt venture soon.

But Jacob seems to have forgotten the steps and the angels when he heard God's voice from above him saying, "I am with thee," and replying, "The covenant promises are made with Isaac and Jacob, that he should have a countless seed and be a blessing to the world. Even though lesser destinies await us, there not one who cannot make some little spot better and happier."

A quaint preacher preached on Jacob's ladder with the following outline: 1. Its length—reached to heaven. Its strength—strong enough to bear the weight of the whole world, if they would go up. No infidel, not even the evil has ever been able to upset or even stir it. 3. Its breadth—broad enough for all to go together without crowding or pushing. 4. The way to go up: (1) inquire; (2) begin at the bottom; (3) take a step every day; (4) do not lug the load on your back; (5) keep your eye fixed on the top; (6) not pick at others; (7) do not fall asleep; (8) hold fast.

Jacob, on his part, covenanted not only to worship with words, but also in the consecration of his property, giving a tithe to God as sovereign, and senior partner and friend. The tithe is not of Jewish origin, for we find it mentioned, and not as a novelty, in the days of Abraham. A tenth of property as the minimum to be devoted to religious and philanthropic uses, by way of weaning man from his selfishness, leading towards the better day when all time and all property will be used unselfishly.

"The Best of all is saying, 'I am with thee,' and replying, 'The covenant promises are made with Isaac and Jacob, that he should have a countless seed and be a blessing to the world. Even though lesser destinies await us, there not one who cannot make some little spot better and happier.'"

With all his faults, because there were noble aspirations in his soul, and a great destiny to be worked out, God followed him in his flight. Forty-eight miles he had fled northward from Beersheba in two or three days, no doubt avoiding traveled paths lest the swift Esau, who was hunting him, should overtake him. Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

HUMAN HARMONY

DR. A. C. DIXON, BOSTON, MASS.

Music is not for the ear. A master painting, the colors all harmonizing one with the other, is music on canvas. A grand cathedral, every part harmonizing with other part, is music in stone. A garden of flowers filling the air with sweet odors that please, is music in perfume. Words written or spoken, that thrill our souls, harmonizing with conscience and truth, is music in thought, and sometimes the emotions of the soul, too deep for utterance, make music that we cannot express; it is too delicate to label, and too sweet to describe. Righteousness is music in that it is in harmony with holiness and truth. Right relation is music; wrong relation is discord. No truth ever makes discord with another truth. You sometimes see ten or fifteen instruments in one orchestra, each one different, and yet each one in perfect harmony with all the rest. And so it is with scientific truth, moral truth, historic truth, religious truth, spiritual truth. Truth harmonizes with every truth in the universe. It is one great orchestra of music that sends up its melody into the heart of God. Sympathy is music in that it is harmony with the attitude of God toward people and conditions about us. God enters into the condition of every soul on this earth. What we need to do is to get the attitude of God toward all people.

CHRIST'S TOUCH

REV. E. TRUMBULL, D.D., CINCINNATI, O.

To quiet the fevers of sin, doubt, and anxiety, you need the touch of the Master. To quiet the fevers of domestic sorrow and trouble, to quiet the fevers of greed, lust of power, or a worse lust, insensibility to fine ethical distinction and the evils in the world which pervade society, commerce, politics, education, and philanthropy, you need the touch of the Master. To quiet the fevers of national and international unrest, to arbitrate all difficulties, all causes of oppression, and to keep the stronger nations within the limits of respect for the rights and privileges of the weaker, you need the touch of the Master. That touch is a redemptive one. It was always so. Think not that you "can be redeemed by silver and gold," culture, civilization, or even by the arts and sciences, and the great philosophies which rule in the domain of thought. There is one Redeemer, one Saviour, and there is one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus. The individual, the family, and the wider relationships, need redemption, that every form of life, either of the individual, or community, may be quickened, sanctified, and raised to higher levels of service, in the profitable activity of Christlike ministrations. But that hand Divine has larger mission even than to quiet raging fevers. It is raised with the gesture of omnipotency to cleave a brilliant pathway of hope through all the storm-clouds of earth to a rectified universe. To it is given the stupendous task of "making all things new." That hand is busily engaged in constructing "the new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

THE GATES OF THE CITY OF GOD

The life of the Church is ordered life, foursquare. There are "walls great and high." But they are for protection and defense against whatever "defileth, worketh abomination, or maketh a lie"—not to shut out any that would come in from the farthest of far-off countries; for in the walls are gates three on each of the four sides—three times as many gates as walls—so that none who seek may fail to find them; and they are open. Let this impartiality of admission and equity of privilege stand for the broad welcome of all conditions and stages of our personal experience: Gates on the east where the day breaks, for childhood, coming and consecration early; gates on the north, for minds returning out of the Arctic frost of intellectual unbelief; gates on the south, for natures heart-sick with the fever of passion, and on the west for them that come tired out as their sun goes down, finding the way open at last at the eleventh hour.

WEIGHTS THAT HINDER

DR. MARCUS DODS, IN LAFAYETTE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says (Heb 12: 1) that we must lay aside every weight. In a race every one tells, and any one who is bent upon winning would not enter a race unless he were prepared to rid himself of every particle of flesh that is mere weight. Everything which does not help, hinders. Our sincerity is similarly tested. He that takes the Christian life seriously gets rid of even those personal tempers, tastes and habits which do not positively help him. He finds so great is the strain that he must do so if he is to win. These weights are extremely difficult to deal with, and he made in which a man deals with them is generally a device for character. The way to discover what is the weight is to run. Standing, you cannot believe—you never will believe—that a minute article will prove a weight; but when you have run, even a short distance, off goes everything you can spare. So, in the Christian life, the one sole rule is to get to run. The question is not one to be settled point by point. Is it right to go to balls, to the race course, to the theatre, to bet; in what form is gambling permissible? Is Sunday golf or bicycling right? The question is an absolutely simple one. Is the Christian running a race? In other words, is he satisfied with the great object he has chosen and is he in the pursuit of it? While standing still, contemplating life and the Christian life, you cannot be persuaded that this or that will retard you, but no sooner have you seriously committed yourself to a Christian career than you find yourself dropping habits, amusements; becoming indifferent to pursuits you formerly thought indispensable to life, and thinking that the most valuable of the valuable things are those which are easily carried. The racer's jeweled belt makes him run not a whit slower; it is some base lump of lead or clay that keeps him back. That which most seriously retards a Christian is some lumber of his own picking up, which he would gladly be rid of but has not the independence and manliness to drop. Some base association, some disreputable habit, of which he himself is ashamed.

DIVINE FORGIVENESS

DR. R. A. BEARD, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

THE first opportunity Jesus had, after Peter's denial, for a private conversation with him is the one mentioned in the last chapter of John. There are three or four clear indications in the account of this incident, that, after the early morning meal of broiled fish was over Jesus and Peter retired a short distance for a private interview. Concerning that terrible sin which was now, no doubt, uppermost in Peter's thought, Jesus said never a word. He said simply: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" The pathos, the tenderness, the love which Jesus put into that thrice-repeated question none but Peter will ever know. But we do know that from that moment we have a new Peter, so that on the day of Pentecost the man who was once afraid to confess Christ to a Jewish maid now proclaims him to the assembled multitude of those who had scourged and crucified him. The divine forgiveness is not a forgiveness that allows our sins to be continually flaunted in our faces after we have been pardoned. "I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more." When our sins are forgiven they are buried something as the body of Moses was buried! Not only was his body buried, but his grave, and the graveyard were buried also, so that "No man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day." "Thou, Lord, art great and ready to forgive." God is always ready to forgive.

INSIGNIFICANT FOES

DR. JOSEPH PARKER, LONDON, ENGLAND

THE danger does not lie always along what might be called the line of giants. There are more difficult forces to contend with than the visible and gigantic. Oh, man! great, grand, man; swift and beautiful with the beauty of God in many respects, you are not being ruined by giants; not by great eruptions of alien armies, but by some little, miserable, contemptible sin, habit, meanness, fault. You look well, but you are being eaten up by the insect Temptation, the little mean temptation for which there are no words. So grand a man as you tormented to death by some microscopic fiend! It may be some love of fashion, some occasional but hateful desire; some habit that gradually obtains and secures the mastery of the soul. You can see a great man overthrown by an insect habit. Oh, the pity of it; oh, the sorrow! We have been often told of the insect in certain countries that eats away all the woodwork of the door and leaves nothing but a coat of paint, so that on going to the door to open it, it falls to pieces on the slightest pressure. That is translated into the life of to-day and into the life of every day. The paint is right, the externalism is beyond criticism; all seems to be well, but take care! for the white ant has eaten up all the interior, and nothing is left but some flake of paint. I bid you beware that there are many assailants and enemies who are not giants by name, but are giants by influence, in obstinacy of purpose, in a cruel determination to ruin your soul.

UNITED BY LOVE

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, NORTHFIELD, MASS.

THE Church of Christ is cursed to this day with cliques and parties and divisions and names, but so far as we have realized God's purpose for us as his, there is a bond that binds us to each other. Men of different nationalities, of different temperaments, of different aspirations naturally, what is it that makes us one, so that we are more one with each other in Christ than in any other bond of the earth? It is the oneness of the holy nation, and it is created by the overwhelming wonder of divine government. One God and one Father of us all; and in our common allegiance to our God and Father, in our common loyalty to his anointed King we realize the communion of saints, we are a holy nation. In the proportion in which you and I are manifestly the unity of the church we are showing the world the excellency of God in his government. In proportion as we live as though we were his own, we are showing forth his life. There is a very subtle reaction in this last thought. In proportion as I realize that I am the child of love, in that proportion shall I love; and in proportion as I love and my love is manifested in the world, in that proportion I manifest the excellency of the divine love. Oh, I pray, my brethren and sisters, that in the power of the life that is yours in Christ as a result of your priesthood and access to God, as the outcome of your submission to his government, that you let his love dwell in you richly and be manifested in all your life, for so do you show forth the excellencies of God in the midst of the age.

IMMORTALITY

DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, PLYMOUTH CHURCH, BROOKLYN

THE measure of Christ's influence upon the world's conception of death is furnished by history alone. He found death a king of terrors; he left it the king of mysteries. He found the grave a black point where the soul vanished into nothingness; he left it a golden cloud where God and the soul met in the name of an eternal friendship. He found death set forth by those images named the skull and crossbones, the skeleton and the scythe; he left it an event so beautiful that earth's loveliest flowers were not sweet enough to garland that glorious event named dying. He found death with only one color, black, and he made it gold; with only one song, a dirge, and he turned the dirge into a symphony; with only one record, a slab with an epitaph, and left instead a door of pearl; and for the skeleton he substituted an angel, who whispered, "Not here, but risen."

A RELIGIOUS NATION

REV. S. H. HOWE, D.D., CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, NORWICH, CONN.

SOME people are not going to church, but some people have been always staying away; and if we ministers would spend less time bemoaning the fact, and have something better to say and to be heard, perhaps there would be more people in church than there are. People may be a little tired of old platitudes and disgusted with our cumbersome ecclesiasticism, our extravagance in church building and its expensive maintenance, and they perhaps have good reason to be. God may be about to smash a lot of our ecclesiastical china that we may get back to primitive simplicity; but do not suppose for one moment that we are not a religious nation, and that Christianity is not as sure of its place in the life of the people as the sun in the heavens. There may be local eclipse, but rest assured its lines are gone out into all the earth.

LOFTY IDEALS

DR. CHARLES S. WING, BROOKLYN

WE are called to be true and honest and pure. The standard is perfection. To be satisfied with less is sin. To have striven earnestly, steadily, for attainment, and come short, is sinless imperfection. We must aim at perfection because a standard above our reach is the law of growth and improvement. The satisfied man is doomed. A holy discontent means healthy progress; contentment means finality and decay. The desire for perfection leads a man to seek what he will not reach, but it lifts to a superiority, a supremacy, he could in no other way have acquired. The writer, the artist, the orator, the builder, the inventor, and the Christian will improve only by following high ideals, and will reach the highest that is attainable when the soul rejects all other standards and reaches for perfection. Character, to be secure, must rest on foundations, and rise through the years by plan and labor and correction. It cannot spring at once into being, full grown. Paul grew to be magnificent because he was not satisfied to be imperfect. He was leaving those things which were behind, with which too many would have been content, and reaching unto those perfections which he saw before him. Let us follow his example, and never relinquish our effort, and never be discouraged, though we never attain. We are not lost until we cease to strive.

THE day had been unusually trying, and Mrs. Elmore was very tired when at last she had tucked her babies into bed and seen Bridget walk down the street for her evening call on the sister who lived just around the corner. Mrs. Elmore turned up the lamp and laid the new CHRISTIAN HERALD invitingly uppermost on the pile of papers and magazines, which she hoped would tempt her husband to read something aloud for her entertainment. Her own evening work was laid out in a basket, which overflowed with stockings to mend, with little gowns, frocks and trousers in need of repairs, and with the new gown which she was by degrees evolving for herself from two half-worn ones. Everybody's basket of work is full, as mothers know, but Mrs. Elmore's was cr-ful, for she had a large family and was a scrupulously neat housekeeper, who had never acquired the art of slighting a single thing in the day's routine. Often late she had been aware of something new in her experience—a sense of loneliness and depression such as she had never felt before, and her nerves, hitherto so firm, had grown unsteady. What she needed was rest and a break, a chance to drop her work for a little while; but if ever she thought about this, the possibility was so remote that she bravely put the idea out of her mind as not to be considered at all.

One thing she did covet, and that she was increasingly deprived of—the pleasure of her husband's society in the evenings. John Elmore was a good citizen, a good workman at his trade, and a good provider in his home. When they were first married, he and Mary were constantly with each other, but gradually a change had come to pass. She was occupied with the care of her little group of sons and daughters, all close together like steps, and he became interested in outside affairs—in the school-board, the town improvement, the building fund association, and, more than all, in the club.

Mrs. Elmore approved of public spirit in her husband, and was proud of him as a rising man. But when, six nights out of seven, she sat alone in her little parlor, sewing or reading, not a soul to relieve the monotony, she sometimes felt that she would prefer to have John's company, even if John had less to do for the public welfare.

The parlor looked very pretty, a bunch of golden-rod and purple asters on the mantel, and the big chair for John pushed to the best place for reading.

Presently John came in; a big, blond man, with blue eyes and a shock of yellow hair, six-foot two, and as handsome as a picture. Mrs. Elwood lifted her eyes to him and sighed.

"You are in evening dress, John? And thought you meant to spend this night with me."

"This night? Why, is there any special reason, Molly? The club is to receive General Frenchson and his staff, and I am on the committee. I wish it were a holiday night, but it isn't, and I couldn't well plead an excuse. If you had mentioned it this morning, little man, I might have begged off, but it's too late now!"

"It's our wedding anniversary, John—that's all!"

"Sure enough, and I forgot it completely. Never mind, darling; forgive your old husband, and we'll keep it up in fine style when it comes round again next year. Good-by, Mary. There are Harry Post and Frank Barclay at the door waiting for me."

A kiss and a nod, and John was gone.

As for Mary, she put her work aside, and bowing her head in her hands, cried, hot, scalding tears dropping one by one as if pressed out of her heart. She cried until, the words beating over and over in her brain: "I forgot our wedding-day, and he doesn't care." The thought that had bound her fast to John in a ring of fidelity trust and love suddenly scorched and bit her as it had been a fetter. Mary Elmore's gaze went back over the past twelve months. Her solitary evenings, her incessant housework, the babies upstairs, the baby at her good times were passed, and this hard life was going on forever.

In the midst of her tears there was a knock at the door, and Mary never heard it. The visitor waited a second, turned the knob and came in. It was John's Aunt Phebe, a great friend of the family, and Mary's particular ally and helper.

"Why, Mary!" she exclaimed. "Why, Mary!"

"Oh—Aunt Phebe!"

"What is it, dear? Tell me!"

"A headache," stammered Mrs. Elmore.

"Nonsense!" said Aunt Phebe. "People cry themselves into headaches, not over them. Tell me what has happened?"

"Indeed, Aunt, I have nothing to tell," answered the wife, too loyal to complain of her lord. "I was tired and melancholy, and the blues got the better of me. I'm glad you came in."

"So am I," declared her aunt; "and now that I'm here I'll just sit awhile, and if you are tired out you go to bed. John's at the club, I presume, and won't be back till midnight. Lucy Anne will stop for me when her Browning Class has finished its session, and in the meantime I'll amuse myself."

Mrs. Elmore yielded. She was in no mood to converse, and, indeed, felt too ill to be company for any Lucy Anne, whom John had tossed in the air when she was a roly-poly baby, and whom he regarded, now that she was a beautiful girl, with an air of cousinly proprietorship!

"She's not going to be so easily killed," said Aunt Phebe, whose keen eyes and ears had taken note of the listener at the door; "but he is killing her love—and that's worse! He does not drink or gamble or beat his wife; he simply neglects her—shoves her into a corner of his life and goes on his own way. John likes to be with men, he enjoys a jolly evening, and he fancies that Mary is well off and happy because she is at home with her children. You notice, do you not, how seldom John goes to church with Mary now? He is too tired, after a Saturday night at the club, to attend church on Sunday morning."

"Well," Lucy Anne chimed in, "if Edgar Brewster had married Mary Allen, it would have been different. He courted her when John did, and he has never married. They say in Lincoln that Edgar never got over his disappointment when she refused him."

"She was very pretty," said Aunt Phebe, "but she's losing her good looks fast. Flowers do when frost blights them. Well, I must go home after all. Turn the lamp down, Lucy Anne, and tread softly. The poor child is asleep, and I hope isn't going to be ill, but Dr. Ames is worried about her. He told me yesterday she's on the road to nervous prostration. If she has to go to a sanatorium it'll make a hole in John's savings. His sister Jane could come and take care of the house. Come, daughter, we'll just slip off home."

John softly stepped round the corner of the porch till his relatives were out of sight. He had heard some rather plain truth, and he was wholesomely wounded. All the evening he had had an uneasy sense of meanness, in leaving his wife alone to spend her wedding evening. Now he perceived how he looked through Aunt Phebe's eyes.

"I am a selfish brute!" he muttered, as he went upstairs in his stocking feet.

Mary was asleep and did not stir. Her husband looked at her. There were hollows in the cheeks that had been so round, and silver threads were showing in the dark brown hair. Her face had the grievous look that a child wears when she has sobbed herself into dreamland. A sharp compunction pricked John's heart. He tried to undress very quietly, and in the effort made considerable noise. He dropped the hair-brush on the floor and knocked over a chair in the endeavor to be perfectly still.

Mary awoke. "That you, John?"

"Yes, Molly."

"It's most morning, isn't it?"

"I'm afraid so, Mary. But," and the big hand stole tenderly under the cover and took hers, which lay in his unresisting, but with no returning pressure, "I'm ashamed of myself, and I beg your pardon, dearest. I've made up my mind to resign from the club. Married men ought not to carry its burdens. I'm going to turn over a new leaf and be with you more, and—Mary—I'm sorry."

"Don't say another word, John."

Two arms were around his neck, a soft cheek was laid against his. Mary forgave him on the spot. He did not tell her what he had overheard, and Aunt Phebe and Lucy Anne kept their own counsel. But John's resolution was not broken. And Mary did not have nervous prostration, and does not now seem in the slightest need of going to a sanatorium.

Insomnia

The distress of sleeplessness assails us when we are overtired, when we have indigestion, and when our conscience is not at peace. Sometimes people do not sleep well as they grow old. Age needs less sleep than childhood, which is the period of building the physical edifice. If you cannot sleep, try closing the eyes and lying perfectly still. Sometimes a little food, a cup of hot milk or of cocoa, or a biscuit, will divert the blood from the brain at night and bring repose. If you cannot sleep, do not fret. Fretting never helps the least bit.

THE FRIEND OF THE FAMILY

WE haven't a fleet little pony, but a gentle heifer will do, If I have an errand, she'll take me, as easy as any old shoe. She's as kind and as ready and willing as the daintiest thoroughbred, And she'll not run away with her mistress; it's safe to give her her head. And I tell you, our family prize her, and pet her and feed her, no end, For this is our Daisy, our Treasure, the truest, the best—and our friend.

one. She went to her room, and soon, mercifully, slept the deep sleep of exhaustion.

When, at the stroke of twelve, John Elmore came home, he was amazed to see a bright light still in the parlor, it not being Mary's habit to sit up for him. He tiptoed up the garden walk, and was surprised at that hour to see Aunt Phebe and her daughter calmly established there, deep in conversation. No Mary was visible. John was about to open the door and enter when he heard his own name, and was arrested with the surprise one naturally feels when he hears himself discussed.

Aunt Phebe was talking in a low voice, but her tones were emphatic.

"I'm sorry, Lucy Anne, but I'm not going away till my nephew comes home, if it's two o'clock in the morning. You may sleep later to-morrow to make up for this. John is a most thoughtless, selfish and ordinary fellow, and I'm afraid the Elmore blood is cropping out. I used to fancy he was more Wilkinson than Elmore, but I was mistaken."

"John is slowly killing Mary" were the next words John heard. Lucy Anne said them in her positive way.

A REVIVAL IN A CARRYALL

DRIVER HILLIARD[†] AND HIS GOSPEL WAGON

WHILE the late evangelist, D. L. Moody, was holding aloft the torch of Gospel truth he was ever anxious to set others to work in the same cause. He believed that every converted man had a work to do for God. He was a ready organizer, and quickly perceived what men were fitted to do. Being asked about a young man who was thinking of studying at Northfield, and who wanted to know if he should go into the ministry, Mr. Moody, quick as a flash, said: "Don't put him into the ministry. I never advise any one to go into the ministry. Keep him out if you can. If God puts him in it will be all right!" But when a converted man wanted to work for his Saviour, Mr. Moody would put him to work instantly.

Riding over the Berkshires in "Church Wagon Number Three," we walked up some of the hills to rest the horses. The driver, Nelson G. Hilliard, told us some anecdotes of his fifteen years driving through rain and snow.

"I was converted under Moody's preaching," he said. Then he went on to tell how, at that memorable meeting, the church could not hold all the townspeople who came, and so the evangelist spoke from the steps.

The day of Hilliard's conversion, Mr. Moody said to him: "Now you are saved, go to work." "But what can I do?" asked Hilliard, who was willing, but timid and diffident. "Why, hitch up your team and go out and gather in the scattered folks to the meetings," was Moody's answer.

At the next meeting, Hilliard drove up with his first load, gathered from far-away farm-houses. Mr. Moody raised money for a large wagon, which was bought and dedicated to this service. For fifteen years Mr. Hilliard faithfully obeyed the advice of the evangelist. In the winter he uses a large double sleigh for gathering in the people. He loves the work, and feels that it is something to help on the meetings and church services. At conferences you will always find "Church Wagon Number Three" standing under the elms, waiting for the benediction and the people.

At farm-houses, poor-houses and out-of-the-way places, he gathers the people to church and special services, and literally he goes out into the highways and hedges that he may bring them in.

"Many impressive meetings have been held right here in this wagon," he said. "We have had prayer meetings, and precious ones, too—here, while I held the reins. One evening I drove ten Mount Hermon students to hold a meeting three miles away in a hall. My wife and my father joined the party. When the wagon started we began a prayer meeting that lasted all the way, in which all thirteen took part.

It was really the beginning of a revival, for our little meeting carried a blessing into the hall, and there were several conversions as a result. That was one of the best of my drives, and its memory will always cling to me." W. J. P.

The Philadelphia Tent Meetings

FOR the third summer, the Presbyterian churches of Philadelphia and vicinity, have conducted a Summer Campaign, through the use of tents located in various districts of the city. Each year the work has increased in the number of tents used and the attendance upon the services, and we believe, in effectiveness. Last week almost twenty thousand people attended the services as conducted in six tents. Seven tents, however, are in operation, one of them taking the place of the regular church services, and the others having Gospel meetings conducted in them every night in the week except Saturday; also Sunday afternoon. These tents are located in densely populated sections of the city. They remain for at least two weeks in a place, and sometimes longer. The speakers now engaged in the tent work are Rev. Ford C. Ottman of Newark, Rev. L. W. Munhall, Rev. J. McP. Scott of Toronto, Rev. J. F. Carson, D.D. of Brooklyn, Rev. W. H. Hindman of Lincoln, Neb., Rev. H. H. Wells, D.D. of Willoughby, Ohio. Others who have been engaged thus far as speakers, and have taken part in the services are Rev. Arthur J. Smith, Rev. F. W. Farr, Rev. D. S. Toy, Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, Rev. R. Howard Taylor and John McNeill. The influence of these services is being daily extended through the homes and business places of the neighborhoods in which they are located. In a number of tents, inquirers come up voluntarily, asking the workers to call upon them. Where personal work is done from house to house, good results follow. Children's meetings are arranged for August in all the tents.

Open air services have been held on the plaza of Philadelphia City Hall with large audiences. The city authorities gave permission to conduct the services, and also gave police protection.

Largely as a result of the Philadelphia work the past three years, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which met last May in Philadelphia, being so deeply interested in the results of the Philadelphia work, was led to appoint a special evangelistic committee for the entire Church, for the purpose of organizing and stimulating evangelistic work. So far as we know, this is the first time that this branch of church work has been so recognized, and become so effectively an organic part of the church life. This committee is planning to conduct conferences with a view to organizing evangelistic work in various towns and cities throughout the land.

CHRIST'S LOVE

There's a song of praise in my heart to-day
And a gladness no words can tell,
As I think of the love that is holding me,
That never can change or fail:
Other love may grow cold as the years roll by,
Other friends may forgetful be;
But Jesus never forgets his own
Through the years of eternity.
Sorrows may gather about my path,
Kind friends may be borne from my side;
But the arms everlasting around me fold,
And still I in peace abide.
He hath promised me strength for the stormy
As well as those that are bright;
He has bidden me rest in his loving care
In the darkness as well as the light.
My footsteps may falter along the path
And I may lie down to rest,
But nothing can sever me from his love—
In life or in death I'm blest;
For he knows each grave where his loved ones sleep,
They are safe in his tender care,
And though I may pass through death's gloomy vale,
His love will surround me there.
As the living plant to the sunlight turns,
Unconscious of all beside,
So my heart would forget all its earth-born joys
In the love of the Crucified.
Oh, I cannot be satisfied until I shall see
The light of his beautiful face,
And hear the sweet welcome he hath for me—
Forgiven and saved by grace!

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR

Idleness and Industry Contrasted--Why Some Thrive and Others Grow Poorer

BY FLORENCE CLINTON SUTRO

In a recent article, entitled "A Social Uplift," which appeared in a metropolitan daily, and which dealt with the conditions that prevail among the poor of the East Side of New York, Mrs. Sutro expressed views that have given rise to considerable discussion. The contribution printed below was elicited by a letter to Mrs. Sutro, and as further views concerning social conditions present a view of the case seldom considered--i. e., the rewards of intelligent industry--we have requested her permission to give it in full through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

You ask if I think "the present order that multiplies millionaires and tramps is a social condition begot of God or an ordinance of man." You say "the palliatives of charity from the time of Christ until the present day have failed to banish poverty," and speak of the text: "The poor ye have always with you." I think, if you will read the 25th chapter of St. Matthew, you will find that Christ especially praises industry, for he says: "To every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." This occurs in the parable of the talents. You remember he said that "the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and another one; to every man according to his several ability. Then he that had received five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two. But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his Lord's money." And that, I feel, is the way he teaches the reward of industry. If you want to see the difference between the really poor classes and the industrious class, go among the rich and among the poorer, at any time. If you ride down in the third Avenue elevated railroad, or walk through the poorer districts, you will see men and women sitting with their elbows on the window sills, just looking out at the windows. Go among the rich and you will find them occupied, and not standing idly by and allowing their talents to be buried. This lesson is not efficiently understood. When men like

Mr. Carnegie or Mr. McMillin spend all their time in thought and work, and the Lord has increased their wealth, and has taken away "even the one talent" from the "lazy man" who buried it, and given it to the one who has ten talents, it is only showing people that each person in the world has duties to do. Every human being has work to do, and I find that the educated, rich class are the most industrious, as they have learned to love work, and are not dissatisfied when they have to do the things for which they exist, and for which they are brought into the world. Some say it is more pleasant to be idle, but we do not exist simply to take pleasure, and not have action or exertion.

To be healthy and have sufficient of this world's goods to make one comfortable, follow nature's teachings--the birds, ants, spiders, bees, plants, are all working together to put in order their several parts of the universe, and every human being has his work to do. It is a common saying that, "The world owes me a living and I am going to get it." But what is the world? Are not you a part of it? Why not say: "I am a part of the world, and owe it to others to help give them a living." Nature has fixed bounds for eating and drinking, and for resting, and could the poor be taught to follow nature's teachings and have also this parable of the talents constantly before them, there would be fewer "unprofitable servants" to be "cast out into outer darkness where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

You say the rich had no use for Jesus in his time, and have no use for him now. In this you are quite mistaken, for it is the rich and industrious classes that make the greater sacrifices in personal time and service, than the poor and slothful do, for their fellow-men. I think it is the poor who are content to remain in ignorance about the work and industry of the rich, but go a good deal by their own imagination; and, as the slothful servant in the parable, when called upon to give an account of his lord's money, immediately began to accuse his master of being unjust and hard, when, in reality, it was he alone who was to blame for not having more to offer; so, at the present day, do those less fortunate in this world's goods, denounce others more fortunate as the cause of their non-success.

You say you are a student of social ethics and would be pleased to enlighten me, and that you do not approve of our present social system, and if it is to continue the sooner the poor die the better; there will be fewer to compete for the rich man's crumbs. You have not mastered the first principles of Sociology, for without laborers, and many of them, no one could be rich. And you say it is better that a million die than live in semi-starvation. I am sure not one of the million would agree with you, as life is dear to us all, and it becomes dearer as we learn our powers of helping others and know the happiness we ourselves enjoy and can bring to those who will thoroughly learn and understand the 25th chapter of St. Matthew.

I hope my words may have some effect. The Bible, you know, says: "The tongue is a little member and boasteth great things. Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!"

Hundreds of God's people assure us that they are praying for God's special blessing upon this work for little ones. How can it fail to prosper when it is thus upheld before the Master, who said: "Suffer the little ones to come unto me"? To send one child to Mont-Lawn for an outing of ten days costs only $3; $6 sends two; $9, three; $12, four; $15, five; $30 sends ten. These sums cover transportation both ways, medical and caretaker's attention, food, shelter and clothing.

HARD TO PLEASE

Regarding the Morning Cup

"Oh how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa we soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

About two years ago we struck upon Postum Food Coffee, and have never been without it since. We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. She is to-day, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State. I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good" to-day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, "You are looking so well!" I reply, "I am well; I drink Postum Food Coffee. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum Food Coffee."

I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good the Postum has done us, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter,--at least not over my name."--Milford, O.

IN THE SILENCE

OUT in the Silence I often go,
When I am weary of things below;
Oh, such wonderful things as I see,
Out in the land of sweet Harmony.
"Into the Silence" with God I go--
Away from the world--and here I know
Sauties divine I shall surely see,
Or in "green pastures" he leadeth me.

Out in the Silence I long to stay,
Faring farther and father away,
Like the birds that I see in the sky
Summing their wings in the air so high.
Farther and farther each time I go,
More of the mysteries thus to know,
Until some day my flight I shall take,
Ever hereafter my way to make.

Out in the haunts I'm so glad to leave,
Out in the Silence" no billows heave.
It is so peaceful, I love to stay,
Here it is always a summer's day.
Out in the Silence," O, follow me,
Such beautiful things, you too, shall see,
Not pain and sorrow no more you'll know
Out in the Silence" you'll love to go.

little people were very happy to know that they might have the pleasure of sending five children to Mont-Lawn, that beautiful home in the country, under THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S care. Several members of our class earned their contributions to our fund. Miss A., Superintendent Primary Department S. S., North Haven, Conn., $3. Our children's birthday money. They are so interested in Mont-Lawn. I carried my CHRISTIAN HERALD, which contained articles about Mont-Lawn, to Sunday School, and read the stories to the children, and showed them the pictures. When the pennies are brought which represent the age of each child giving, they are dropped into a basket, then we sing a birthday song, and say altogether this little prayer:

Jesus, bless the pennies brought thee,
Give them something sweet to do;
May they help some one to love thee,
May we love thee, too.

Mrs. K., Whitinsville, Mass., $35. Sent by our Junior and Intermediate S. C. E. Our children worked very hard to make the entertainment which brought this success. They have learned the beautiful lesson that it is "more blessed to give than to receive."

This letter tells about a "Gypsy Camp Fire," where the gypsies made money to help Mont-Lawn:

Miss N. L. D., $50.--We are all off on a vacation in one of the most lovely spots in the country--Bostwick Island--one of the Thousand Islands in the picturesque St. Lawrence River. We kindled an immense "gypsy camp-fire" on the rocks at the water's edge, and set up a gypsy tent, and some of us dressed like gypsies. We hung the tree out with Chinese lanterns, and had a small orchestra, consisting of guitars and mandolins. Ice cream and cake were served during the evening. Little boats from all over the river came. As this is a very quiet spot and there are not many camps near here, we were surprised to find how many showed an interest in helping our Fresh-Air Work. Everybody gladly paid the small fee for admission and for the cream. We hope the sum we send may help to bring a little pleasure into lives less blessed than ours with opportunities to breathe pure air, to see nature in her loveliness and to come under Christian influence.

OUR CHILDREN'S FRIENDS

A "Gypsy Camp" in the Thousand Islands Helps Mont-Lawn--"Birthday" Pennies--Kind Words and Happy Givers

OUR Fresh-Air work has brought a great deal of happiness into the lives of grown-up folks and little folk who never saw our Children's Home nor the happy company who play upon its islands. "It is more blessed to give than to receive," said the Master." Hundreds of letters which come to us from generous friends, the fruits of whose self-denial or labor enlarge our work of ministry to the children of the poor, show that the service is a joy and blessing unto themselves. The following extracts illustrate the character of the many letters that have encouraged us:

scious weakness and lack of light. He was holding back, and waiting for a result which could only come after an actual committal to God and his service. In this condition of unrest and indecision he continued for more than a year, often beset with temptations and oppressed by recurring impressions of duty. With other difficulties that appeared insuperable, came the persuasion that, if he should surrender his heart to God, the result would be a call to preach the Gospel. It seemed to be as near a certainty as anything could possibly be that related to the future. It haunted him by day and by night, becoming a real burden, and seriously embarrassing him in his efforts to bring his mind to the point of decision.

After a long struggle, known only to himself and the Lord, the victory was gained, and the solemn purpose to commit all to God, and to follow with cautious step the way of duty, and all providential leadings, was deliberately made. The first step in his case was to unite with the church on probation as a seeker of religion. From that time onward every means of grace was improved, and the way of duty was pursued with steady step, yet with scarcely a ray of spiritual light. The path was rugged, and encouragements few and far from inspiring; but the firmness of purpose was unflinching.

Light at length dawned. Having been taught that faith was the essential thing, Stephen Merrill's chief concern was to obtain the faith that saves. Marvelous were his efforts at believing and trusting. Conjecture after conjecture as to what faith was, and how it ought to come, and what would be its manifestations and the emotions attending and attesting it, were built up and then given up, while the darkness seemed to become more impenetrable. But after the long season of doubting and fearing, of resolving and wrestling, in a way altogether unanticipated, the darkness fled, and as gently as the morning light, the peace and rest of faith settled upon his soul, and soon led to the full apprehension of Christ as his personal Saviour.

The crisis was reached during the busy hours of a week day, while young Merrill was engaged in secular duties. He was reviewing the struggle through which he was passing, and meditating on the difficulties in exercising faith in Christ, whom he surely tried to trust, when the thought suddenly came to him, as if a voice had whispered in his ear, "Why all this hesitation and doubt? You have all the materials of faith. You believe the Bible; you accept Christ; you have no other trust; then why not use your faith just as it is, and cease to wander along in the darkness?" Instantly a thrill of comfort passed through his soul, and he said, "Yes, I do believe; I can and will trust; surely, this is faith!"

From that moment all doubts vanished, and rapidly the horizon of faith cleared and widened, and in a little time his only astonishment was at his slowness to enter into rest. After fifty-five years of most useful public ministry, Bishop Merrill still happily abides in that spiritual rest.

Mr. James Deruyter Blackwell, an aged reader of this paper, who recently departed this life at his home "Oak Spring" in Warrenton, Vt., was greatly beloved by many, far and near, being ever ready with sympathy, counsel and help for the needy. He was a distinguished scholar and poet of no mean order; and his gifts and accomplishments were used for the edification and spiritual comfort of those around him rather than for worldly ends. The memory of his upright life is a rich legacy to the widow and seven children who survive him. Among the family treasures is Mr. Blackwell's last poem, written by him in the sick room whence he went at last to the home where there is no sickness or sorrow. This extract shows how comfortable the Christian found his faith in that dread hour when he knew death stood near:

Though earth be fading from my view
And darkest night seem nigh,
And I must bid the world adieu—
It is not hard to die!
For O, how sweet in death's deep shade,
Amid its strange alarms,
To feel beneath my spirit laid,
The everlasting arms!

Had read the Scriptures, and attended closely to the preaching of the Gospel, till his conviction of the nature of repentance and faith had become clear enough, and the way of salvation appeared plain before his eyes; but the power to avail himself of what he knew to be both privilege and duty seemed to be lacking. His wishes and aims were right. He heartily desired to be on the Lord's side in all things. He approved every call to duty, but hesitated and feared because of con-

MR. SANKEY'S NEW ROLE

AT Seatuck Neck, near Eastport, Long Island, on a bluff overlooking a picturesque little river, and swept by Atlantic breezes, is the summer home of Evangelist Ira D. Sankey. Here the noted Gospel singer and life-long companion of the late Dwight L. Moody is busily engaged in the preparation of his book, entitled, The Story of the Hymns—a comprehensive work, which he expects to finish this fall. He will not take up evangelical work again. The grand voice that has delighted audiences the world over by its superb rendering of Gospel songs, will still be heard frequently in public services, however, for religious work has always held an irresistible fascination for Mr. Sankey, and his songs and addresses fill the largest auditoriums. Thus, in addition to his new role of author, the famous singer will devote himself largely to his lectures and songs. He is still in the prime of life, and with the promise of many years of usefulness in his work for God and humanity.

THE PILGRIM'S VISION

A Revelation in the Desert to the Solitary Sleeper

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN Jacob started on his journey to his mother's former home, he had had no personal dealings with God. He seems to have been a man open to the fear of God, but one in whom the flesh was predominant. After his sin against his father and his brother, Jacob could not remain at home. Even his fond mother understood this, and exhorted him to flee away to Laban, her brother, to "tarry for a few days . . . until thy brother's anger turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou hast done to him; then will I send and fetch thee from thence: why should I be bereaved of you both in one day?" But the few days were many years; and there is no record that his mother, who had taught her son to be deceitful, ever saw his face again. Neither deceit nor yet the taking of things into their own hands could really further the purposes of God. He worked for him that waiteth for him (Isa. 64: 4, R.V.). The old proverb is not always true, that "God helps those who help themselves." God does not favor the idle, but he looks for faith on the part of his children, that they may work, not as his proteges, but as his instruments.

Isaac's charge to Jacob varied from that of his wife. Isaac, as the child of promise, had before him the promises of God which Jacob should inherit; and therefore, in sending him away, it was not merely as a fugitive from the wrath of his brother, but as a man who should be one of the progenitors of the promised Seed of the woman, God's Messiah and Israel's Messiah. Isaac charged his son to take no wife of the daughters of Canaan, but one of the family of Laban; and now a second time, now no longer in perplexity of spirit, as when he thought the hands were the hands of Esau, and the voice the voice of Jacob—he pronounced God's blessing on his younger son (Gen. 28: 1-4). And the man who had loved his home and his parents had to turn his back upon all, because he had not learned to trust his God!

Who can tell the utter loneliness of that night! When Abraham went forth from his home, he was not alone; it was after God had appeared to him that he went with a strong heart. Jacob must have gone out with a heavy heart. He had not yet met with God, and perhaps he may have lost confidence in a measure in both father and mother. Perhaps such may have been his thoughts as he lay down desolate, alone, uncomfortable; with a stone for his pillow. It is at such an hour that God draws near. Jacob dreamed he saw "a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven." This was what he wanted: some way to get at God, some link between a sinful man like himself and a holy God. The ladder was set up on the earth. We read of it again (John 1: 51), and we know it means him who was the Word made flesh, God's own Son, "set up on the earth"; given, because God so loved the world, that men, believing on him, should find him to be the Way, the Ladder, for fallen men to reach God and heaven.

Heaven was real to him now, and God was real. His knowledge of God was no longer tradition or doctrine: Jacob had met with God. Until we have met with God, until something has transpired between God and us, the things of God are outside of us; but from the time heaven is opened to us, they are real, they are part of ourselves. From this hour God from time to time spoke to Jacob. His first communication was significant. It was indeed of grace. "I am the God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac." At once Jacob was welcomed into the family of them that believe. But it is very noteworthy that he did not deal with Jacob as he did with Abraham. To Abraham he spoke first of blessing him and making him a blessing (Gen. 12: 2), and later of giving him the land (Gen. 13: 14-18; 15: 18-21; 17: 4-8). To Jacob the promise of the land came first, and later the assurance that in him and in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed (Gen. 28: 13-14). God knew his man. He saw in Abraham a heart which put his God first in everything, while in Jacob's service, although really a servant of God, there was a large share of self-interest. It was Jacob, in whom Israel as a people, "the dust of the earth," had its beginnings; in Abraham the generation of the men of faith in all time, "the stars of heaven," have a forefather.

Under all the want of uprightness, the meanness and the selfishness of Jacob, God found, nevertheless, a heart which appreciated him, and appreciated his promises. Esau had an eye only to the present; Jacob counted on the future. And yet he had much to learn in the life of trust. He fell again and again into the temptation of seeking to bring about the fulfillment of God's promises by means and efforts of his own. What a common manifestation of unbelief this is in God's children! How many parents pray for the conversion of their children; and then try, by every means in their power, to bring about the answer to prayers, instead of humbling themselves for the lack of Christ in their own lives. By thus not following, but preceding the work of the Holy Spirit, they often force matters, so that they get out of their children a kind of constrained confession of Christ, which the children themselves feel to be unreal, and which really drives them farther from God.

Jacob awakened out of his sleep, but he knew that something very real had happened. "Surely God is in this place," he said, and I knew it not. And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! This is none other than the house of God; this is the gate of heaven." It was a new world. Jacob was no longer alone. He rose up early in the morning, not to weep, but to worship. Taking the stone which had been his pillow, he set it up for a pillar, poured oil on the top of it, and called that holy spot where he had met God, God's house. But Jacob had not yet learned to take God at his word. Instead of praising God that he was with him, and rejoicing that he would keep him, he transferred God's blessing to the future. "He vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God." It was all in the future. Perhaps he looked on his unworthiness more than on God's faithfulness. Perhaps he thought of Abraham's great tests of faith. Anyway, he was not fully trusting his God, or he would have been praising God with a glad heart, and no "if" would have entered his heart. He was as yet far behind his grandfather; a very feeble son of the father of them that believe. And the conclusion of his vow was most characteristic of the man. "This stone . . . shall be God's house, and of all that thou givest me I will surely give the tenth unto thee." He had begun by giving the tenth of his confidence. Abraham counted all the Lord's, even the beloved son of promise. Jacob was honest: Nine-tenths for me, the tithe for thee. But thus it is with the majority, even of believers.

man—now it is mine; and I confess before God and before you, and ask pardon of you all. I make what restitution I can," he turned to the young minister who stood by him, and handing him the paper he had taken from the desk, said: "Mr. Moore, 'Beechwood' is yours, and has been yours all these years. I ask you to give me and to pray for me." He sank on his knees at the altar.

Cinne came and knelt by him, and whispered in his ear: "You have done right, papa," and with his daughter's hand clasping his and with his old friends crowding around him, Frederick Pomeroy, he knelt at that altar and listened to an impassioned appeal to the throne of grace sent up by the man whom he had wronged, received pardon from on high and when he arose it was with tears in his eyes and the look of one who has come near to the Divine heart. After that prayer, no one would leave the house without first shaking him by the hand and assuring him of their continued respect and esteem, for never had Frederick Pomeroy risen to such a height as when he confessed.

For a prolonged season, a love feast, whose memory lasted him for the rest of his life, the three went home to "Beechwood" together, and as they entered the library, Pomeroy said: "This is your home, your home. To-morrow I will—" he said in a sense that he had no other thought than this for the first time assailed him. He stopped. The eyes of Paul and Corie met. She was pale, but her eyes were bright and she was smiling. Not a word of love had passed between them, but they understood each other. One long deep look, then Paul turned and said: "No, father, this is our home."

Frederick Pomeroy went out and left her to herself. The hidden thing was added no longer. MARY C. FRANCIS.

HEAVENLY HELPERS

The Chariots of Fire Round About Elisha
Protecting the Servants of God

RISES surely come in the life of every child of God, when he needs to remember, as Elisha said, that they that are with him are more than they who are against him. Sometimes everything seems to be against him. Poverty, sickness, the reproaches of men, the unfaithfulness of friends, ingratitude and unthankfulness in the family, troubles of all kinds. When the worldly man thus assailed, he is liable to commit suicide. The Christian is liable to lose faith, and to doubt the loving providence of God. Happy for him if his spiritual eyes are opened, and he learns that God is caring for him, and taking care that no real harm shall touch him. After all, he may well remember the worst that this world can do is to kill. It can but kill, and sometimes death would be a blessing. It may strip him of his property, but it cannot take away the treasure he has in heaven. Be- lievers may come upon him, but nothing can deprive him of the Friend who clings closer than a brother. His good name may be smirched by calumny, but he has the blessing pronounced on those of whom men say all manner of evil. Thoughts like these may give him the fortitude which comes to a man defended by "chariots of fire round about him."

Winfer from the story of Elisha, that of a young man with him, the space between the prophet and his approaching assailants seemed as vacant as our surroundings appear to us. Like him, we see no chariots of fire assembled for our defence; but when his eyes were opened he saw them. Must we conclude that because there are none around us that there are none here? True, the enemy often seems to gain the victory. The martyred missionaries in China perished in spite of their faith. Brave men and women in India met their death with the name of Jesus on their lips. Christians in Armenia died rather than deny their Lord. Martyrs have been burned at the stake, and God did not interpose to save them. In the recent India famine cholera seized the devoted helpers, and they were not delivered from death. It is not always that deliverance comes as it came to Elisha. But what then? This life is not all. Christ said that he had only to pray and God would presently give him "more than twelve legions of angels," but he did not ask for them. He preferred to drink the cup that had been mixed for him. It may be that the experience that we call calamity is the thing it is best that we undergo, and, like our Lord, we have to go through to the bitter end, that, like him, we may, in the world to come, be "crowned with glory and honor."

But in our spiritual experience there are times when we may surely count on the presence of the chariots. To the poor victim of vice and degradation, they are within call. The enemy before whom he has so often fallen, approaches him and demands his customary surrender. The traitor within cries, yield. But suddenly the harassed victim has made an unexpected stand, and calling upon God has won the victory. Thousands of such men can testify that the swiftly uttered prayer for help has brought a strength not their own which has triumphed. Or, perhaps, the crisis is one of unutterable sorrow. Death has despoiled the home and all the light has gone out of life. We feel we shall go mourning all our days. No joy can ever enter the heart again. Then, in answer to prayer, the chariots may become visible. A new mission, the legacy of the departed, may be taken up, some work left unfinished by the dead may be completed as a memorial, and in the busy occupation hallowed by love of the lost one, undreamed of rest and peace and exultation brighten the life. The chariots of God have formed a wall that has kept the tide of sorrow from overwhelming us. In some way, not always the same way, the soul that puts its trust in God finds help and succor in the emergencies of life. At the worst, if the cup must be drained to the dregs, the sweet presence of Him who suffered for us is with his tried follower; reminding him that the servant is not greater than his Lord.

Gospel Work at the Pan-American

THE attention of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already been called to the good work conducted in the "Tent Evangelist," which was erected at the principal entrance of the Pan American Exposition as a place of spiritual rest and refreshment for the strangers within our gates, and especially for our Southern visitors. The services in English did not meet the needs of the latter, hence supplementary features, consisting chiefly of meetings where the talks and hymns are in Spanish, are being provided. The work to be conducted in close co-operation with the Tent Evangelist and as a sort of annex to it. Our Latin-American visitors must be sought out, invited to headquarters; evangelical literature in Spanish must be circulated. Through arrangement with the Presbyterian Board of Missions, Rev. J. Milton Greene, D.D., long in Mexico and lately in Porto Rico, heads the list of initiators of this unique branch of Gospel work, his services covering the first ten days of August! The number of his successors depend upon the reception of sufficient funds to sustain the work. Missionaries of various denominations familiar with the language and customs of the Latin-Americans, are ready and eager to do the work, if only their bare expenses can be raised. The opportunity is great; the time very brief; the cost very small—but a few hundred dollars are necessary to make this pious effort a success. There are now at the Exposition representatives from every Latin-American State; to these delegates, commissioners, exhibitors, sight-seers—people of exceptional culture and influence in their own lands—are presented every aspect of our material progress and prosperity, in elegant and impressive forms of display. Shall we fail in our presentation of the moral and spiritual basis of our wonderful development? Back of our freedom, our security, our promise; lie our open Bible, our religious liberty, our reverence for the Lord's Day! The undenominational "Gospel Campaign" at the Exposition, while not assailing the creeds of our visitors, seeks to show unto them the more excellent way of religious liberty as the basis of all true freedom. The writer, if addressed at 756 Quincy Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., will take pleasure in giving any further information that may be desired concerning this work, and will supply free, descriptive pamphlets for distribution.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The usual five new questions are omitted this week, in order that other letters to "The Mail Bag," many of them long delayed, may receive attention. Hereafter, once a month, the entire page will be devoted to this class of letters.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

H. L. Smidusky, O. Is it a sin for a Christian to visit a pleasure resort on Sunday, if he or she does not join in with the evil-doers?

We are to avoid the very appearance of evil, and certainly if we give it our countenance and "stand by consenting," we cannot be blameless.

J. W. B., South River, Ont. What five animals live the longest (with their ages)?

The elephant, which has been known to live over a hundred years, ranks first among mammals in point of longevity; the camel, living fifty to eighty, comes next. The limit of the horse is forty; of the deer, thirty; ox fifteen to twenty. Pike and carp, it is said, have been known to live 150 years; the tortoise is accredited with being a centenarian; Hindoos declare that the crocodile lives more than a century. Eagles and crows have been known to live a hundred years. The sea Anemone, or "Animal Flower," has been known to live for seventy-five years. The shortest terms of existence, it is believed, are found among the infusoria, or microscopic creatures inhabiting water.

B. D. E., Zanesville, Ind. Give names of Presidential candidates and the popular vote of the Prohibition party in each campaign from 1876 to 1900?

In 1876 the candidate was Green Clay Smith, of Kentucky, and the popular vote was 9,522; in 1880, Neal Dow, of Maine, was candidate, and the vote was 10,305; 1884, John P. St. John, of Kansas, vote 15,809; 1888, Clinton B. Fisk, New Jersey, vote 249,907; 1892, John Bidwell, California, vote 264,133; 1896, Joshua Levering, Maryland, 132,007; 1900, John G. Woolley, Illinois, vote 208,555.

Mrs. G. L. P., Marion, Ind. 1. Are there not much more superstitions in the world to-day than in the time of Christ? 2. Do you not think that the recent bull fight at Omaha, which was witnessed by over 10,000 people, including the Governor of the State and two ministers of the Gospel, was a very disgraceful and demoralizing affair? 3. In almost every town of any size in Indiana, Sunday baseball games are common amusements, accompanied by the usual profanity and betting. What shall we do? Can you not send us a few missionaries?

1. No; much less. Education and an enlightened Christianity have broken down many superstitions. Compare the superstitions of mediæval times with those of to-day, and you will appreciate the change. 2. Yes; one that called for the severest censure from press and pulpit. 3. Where is your Sabbath Observance League? Have you none in Indiana?

B. F. D., Tecumseh, Neb. Will God pardon an old man, whose loved ones have passed into the other world, for praying that he may die that he may rejoin his departed friends?

Many good men have prayed for death and many more have longed for it without praying for it. God knows our frame and our imperfections and will assuredly pardon such a prayer. But is there nothing more that you could do for your Lord before you go? The Apostle Paul desired death for his own sake, but continued life for the sake of those whom he was anxious to help. A better prayer than yours, would be that you might make the best possible use of the time left to you before the summons comes.

C. R. M., New York City. Have angels wings?

There is little positive Scriptural authority for the popular conception of the angelic form as endowed with wings. The "angels" of the Bible, who visited men, seem to have appeared in the human form, and were often accepted and entertained as men until, through the utterance of some remarkable prophecy or the manifestation of some supernatural quality, their spiritual nature was disclosed. The fact that they were "messengers" of God, may have supplied basis for the idea that they have wings as a means of swift and ethereal progression. The winged cherubim and seraphim seem to belong to a higher order of celestial beings than those designated "angels," since they are always represented as standing in the immediate presence of God in heaven or guarding his dwelling-place on earth. The golden cherubim watching over the mercy-seat in the ark of the covenant were four-winged, so were those mighty figures under whose outstretched pinions the ark was placed in Solomon's Temple. Four-winged were the "living creatures" of Ezekiel's dream, "who every one went straight forward whither the spirit was to go." Six-winged were the seraphim of Isaiah's vision, who stood above the "Throne of the Lord," crying, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts"—almost the same song which later the four-winged "beasts" of Revelation cried day and night before the Throne.

S. B. G., Hares Valley, Pa. Have there ever been a trace of ruins, or improvements, which were made before the Deluge?

Josephus, the Jewish historian, in his Antiquities, Chap. 2, states that a pillar, erected by the prehistoric descendants of Adam, was still standing "in the land of Siriad" at the time the historian wrote. This was one of two pillars erected in consequence of Adam's prediction (according to Jewish tradition) that the world would be destroyed once by fire and once by water, and they not knowing which, put up a pillar of stone and another of brick, upon each of which were inscribed the discoveries and inventions of prehistoric man. It is believed, however, by later Biblical scholars, that Josephus wrongly identified Seth with Sesostrius, King of Egypt, and mistook the postdiluvian pillar of Sesostrius for an antediluvian memorial. Thus far, it may be stated, there has been no reliable discovery of antediluvian remains.

Henry B., St. Albans, Vt., writes:

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 24, page 653, is mention of a church which for two years has believed there was no life beyond the grave. In effect he says: "A man who does not believe in immortality might naturally say, in considering such a life as mine, that it is folly. Instead of fighting with beasts as I did at Ephesus, and enduring all kinds of hardship and persecution, it would be better for me if I simply enjoyed the good things of life. Such a man could never be persuaded to become a Christian if there was no prospect of a future life."

Concerning a recent question in THE MAIL-BAG as to the population of the world, J. H. R., Lucas, O., writes:

Since reading the answers to questions in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 24, I find this: Delplan gives figures to prove that the planet earth has supported 66,627,842,237,075,266 human inhabitants since the beginning of time. As there are only 50,000,000 square miles of land surface, this would make considerably over fifty people per square foot were they all here now. Proctor is quoted as saying: "If from a single pair for 5,000 years, each man and wife had married at twenty-one, and no deaths occurred, the population of the earth would be 2,199,915, followed by 144 ciphers, and would require to hold this population a number of worlds the size of this, equal to 3,166,526, followed by 125 ciphers. Also the number of births since the birth of Christ, 139,235,017,489,534,946." This is too immense for the human mind to contemplate; so great that the answers given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are but a drop in the bucket, even while they so widely differ.

Subscriber, Amboy, Minn. Does the passage Heb. 6: 4-6 cut the backslider off utterly from hope?

By no means. The invitations to the backslider in the Bible are most earnest, tender and affectionate, and he is assured that he will be welcomed and pardoned if he does return. The trouble is that he seldom has Count is legally their guest. In America alone, this book has brought over $5,000. It is generally understood for a long time he has held no property of his own; 'his keep'—his food and clothing—cost but a song."

J. S., Midway, Va. Why is "foolscap" paper called so?

From the fool's cap and bells water, which was made upon writing-paper in the time of Cromwell. English stationery had borne the royal arms in watermark, and when change made was one of numerous indignities cast upon the memory of Charles I. This monarch, it is said, in order to increase his revenues, had sold to certain parties the exclusive right to manufacture paper.

Reader, Charlotte, N. C. What is the origin of the saying: "If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain?"

According to tradition, the saying originated thus: The Arabs demanded a miracle of Mahomet. He said: "No; it were tempting God." They insisted. He commanded Mount Safa to come to him. When it stirred not, he said, "God is merciful. If it come, it would have fallen upon and destroyed us. I will therefore go to the mountain, and thank God for his mercy to a stiff-necked generation."

E. F. B., Baltimore, Md. 1. Is it consistent for a man who prays for the absolute destruction of the liquor traffic to cast his vote for the date of a party which will license it? 2. Is the principle of tithing mean that a man earns only ten dollars a week should give a dollar to the Lord?

1. In talking with men who do not vote the Prohibition ticket, while ardently desiring the destruction of the traffic, we have found that they usually defend their course by saying that there is no prospect of the success of the Prohibitionists. Consequently, to vote at ticket is to throw a vote away. Between the two parties who may succeed the voter has a very decided preference. He therefore votes the party which he prefers. That is to say, as he cannot have the best, which is his opinion Prohibition, he will try to have the next best, for if he and others do not support it, the very worst may win. 2. That is the strict principle, but some people modify in the case of very small incomes. They decide what they pay for board and give a tenth of the remainder. Thus, if the man's board and room rent come to five dollars a week, a salary of ten dollars he would give fifty cents a week to the Lord.

never resorted to fairs, etc., for the support of religious work. I wish to say that for forty-one years, since the organization of the Free Methodist Church, the entire denomination has kept clear of all such devices, not one church alone, but 665 churches.

Certainly a remarkable showing, and one which well deserves the consideration of other churches.

L. B. C., Radford Furnace, Va. If a young man and woman love each other so devotedly that they are unhappy apart, has God joined them together? If so, is it a sin to oppose their marriage. Would it be wrong for either of them to marry some other person?

This is a very deceptive argument, and liable to mislead. Young people, unfortunately, are not always the best judges of their own affairs. Parents and guardians should always be consulted before any important step is taken, especially a step which involves the welfare of a lifetime, and possibly even eternal well-being. Young people, being inexperienced, are apt to be deceived as to the real nature of their feelings. It has often happened that an awakening of this sort has come, but too late. Another point worth remembering is, that a young man who would deliberately counsel a young girl to set at defiance the wishes of her parents or her guardians—her natural and unselfish protectors—is apt to be one whose love and regard are of very little real value, and whose sense of honor is not of the highest.

L. E. N., Philadelphia. Did Paul mean by his remark (1 Cor. 15: 32), that if he had not expected a resurrection he would have lived a self-indulgent life?

No, he was not that kind of man. In the passage you refer to, he is considering the attitude of an opponent, and is stating such an argument as might be made by one who be-any desire to return. Backsliding seems to have a benumbing effect on the spiritual faculties, so that there develops an indifference and a hardness of heart which keeps the backslider away from God. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews had probably tried to restore some backsliders, and failing, declared it impossible. Many ministers and Christian workers have had the same experience, for it is notorious that there is no man so hard to win as a backslider. But what is impossible with men is possible to God. Many backsliders, like David and Peter, have been restored.

W. E. B., Ellicott, N. Y. Please let me know the condition of the suffering ones in China.

The latest news, detailing the condition of the famine sufferers, has appeared from week to week in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

F. D. McQ., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please answer the following question: About what is the fortune of Tolstoi (the Russian writer), and in what way did he obtain it and how has he disposed of it?

Mr. Ernest H. Crosby, who has visited Count Tolstoi, and is his personal friend, kindly answers this for us as follows: "I regret that I cannot give full and accurate information regarding Count Tolstoi's property. It was originally chiefly landed property, coming to him by inheritance. The story is that he broached the subject of giving his land to the peasants, but his family threatened to have him declared of unsound mind, a common proceeding in Russia where a man wastes his substance. The law, in such cases, prevents a man from disposing of his estate. His wife told me that the Count came to her with tears in his eyes beseeching her to take the property from him, but she told him if it

Multitudes at the Pan-American

At this season, the attendance at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo has reached its maximum. From every State in the Union, crowds of visitors are reaching the Exposition by the various transportation routes, the New York Central and Erie bringing thousands daily. Sixty thousand new visitors was the total of one day's arrivals recently.

T. Filipino Baby

First impressions go a long way toward the formation of lasting opinions, and those in charge of the Exposition arrangements have endeavored to make the first general view of the grounds very impressive. So beautifully are the grounds laid out that one imagines he has entered some old, finely-kept park with broad, winding paths, velvet lawns, studded with brilliant flowers and rows of stately trees. At frequent intervals, broad flights of white steps lead down to artificial lakes and streams, in which rosettes of fountains are constantly playing, catching the sun in rainbow tints by day, and illuminated by the reflection of thousands of lights by night. The whole scene is one of luxuriance and beauty.

The lighting of the Exposition grounds is one of the most attractive features of the Pan-American. That mighty power which thunders at Niagara is transformed into electric current and produces light of unusual brilliancy. At night, the scene is one of dazzling beauty. Every building is literally ablaze, outside and in, and the lights are so placed about the sides, roofs, domes and arches, that at night, when the electric currents are turned on, each building is skeletonized in jets of fire against the dark sky. From a distance nothing but the luminous outlines are seen, and the effect is weirdly beautiful. The electric tower is the magnificent centre of light at the Exhibition grounds. It is the highest structure, and is entirely covered with a lace-like network of electric lights, forming various figures and patterns. Every evening the crowds of visitors stand in the centre of the Esplanade and watch the lights being turned on. From that position one commands a view of all the lights at once, and the effect is novel and beautiful.

The purpose of the Exhibition is to show the achievement of civilization in the New World, and this is evident in all the exhibits, especially in manufactures, agriculture, science, etc., the whole presenting a grand and unusual opportunity for the acquisition of valuable information concerning all the States, and of our neighbors on the Isthmus and in South America generally.

When the visitor is wearied with the contemplation of the architectural display, filled with the delightful strains from the Temple of Music, confused and bewildered with the tremendous aggregation of machinery, and when he has seen the magnificent art collection, the grand sculptures, and other inspiring and instructive sights, he turns to the novel attractions of the Midway. Here everything is full of intense human interest, from the "house upside down," with its queer illusion of inversion, to the dusky-faced Orientals in the streets.

which sits on a mimic snowbank and seems to enjoy life thoroughly. In the Filipino Village the houses are quite picturesque, with low, thatched roofs, and little, ladder-like entrances. In one of these houses may be seen a tiny Filipino baby, the only one ever born in the United States. Besides those mentioned, there are types of several other nationalities represented, including Africa, Mexico, Egypt, Venice, Arabia, Japan, India, Turkey, and others.

Few of the sights shown at the Exposition are more thrilling and realistic than the representation of the Johnstown flood. The town is first pictured sleeping peacefully in the moonlight after a perfect day; the factories in the distance are alive with fire, and great sparks floating up from the furnace chimneys; and the midnight express comes thundering and shrieking into the little, lighted station. Suddenly there is a sound of a great storm rumbling in the distance; the dam bursts, and the whole city is soon buried under a rushing torrent of water; houses fall, and are swept away by the flood; other houses take fire and blaze among the ruins, and the whole scene is one of utter destruction and wreck.

One is struck by the general festival aspect of the Exposition as a whole. It is a nation, or a group of nations, en fete; but it is not a meaningless jubilee, for, with the pleasures afforded to the visiting multitudes, there are mingled sensations that give a keener and subtler delight than mere sight-seeing. On every hand are the evidences not only of the abundant natural resources with which Divine Providence has blessed our land, but of the intellectual, artistic and social progress of the peoples of this continent.

No Exposition has ever so clearly symbolized the spirit of America and its institutions, and no popular aggregation of art, in its manifold expressions, has appealed more directly to the common appreciation than that to be seen at the Pan-American.

It is the first Exposition, moreover, at which there has been an opportunity to include exhibits from our new colonies, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Tutuila, and the Philippines, bringing those distant possessions and their products nearer to American eyes than ever before.

Good results are reported from the inter-denominational evangelistic campaign, which has been carried on under canvas, Sundays and week-days, under the care of a vigorous committee. The seed thus sown may produce a rich harvest in after years.

THE ALASKA BUILDING AT THE PAN-AMERICAN EXPOSITION.

The "Midway" is a source of endless entertainment and instruction. Probably the next best thing to actually traveling in foreign countries, is to see these foreign places and peoples on the "Midway," and to observe their curious homes and customs.

A great deal of interest and instruction is to be gathered in this way from "Darkest Africa," "The Filipino Village," "The Old Plantation," and "The Esquimaux Village." Indeed, one of the features of greatest interest to the visitor is the display of various races. In the Esquimaux village are seen people from the Arctic zone, engaged at their daily tasks and sports as though they were in their native regions. There is nothing extraordinary in the dress of the men, but the women wear peculiar-looking garments, with long tails flapping at their heels. There is a little, fur-clad Alaskan baby,

THE OKLAHOMA "FREE LAND RUSH"

THE FIRST CHURCH ON A TOWN SITE

THE FIRST BANKING HOUSE OPENED ON A TOWN SITE

LAST of its kind—for it is doubtful if it can ever be repeated—the great rush of settlers which took place in Southern Oklahoma lately, has already resulted in the founding of at least one good-sized town and the planting of settlements which will soon become thriving frontier villages. In the years to come, the good people of Lawton, Oklahoma, will tell their children the strange story of the sudden conquest of the great prairie by a great army of twenty thousand home-seekers. It was a novel way of opening the last remaining Indian reservation to public settlement.

When the Government announced that the 13,000 farms in the Kiowa and Comanche reservation would be disposed of at a public drawing at El Reno, there was a tremendous rush to register, for all who were privileged to take part in the land lottery must be duly qualified. Besides, each settler must agree to live on the land fourteen months before proving title.

Before July 29, the first day of the drawing, over 165,000 had registered, and there was a crowd of twenty thousand in attendance. The drawing was by numbers, the lucky ones being those that carried with them the choice of a fine farm. Each number slip was in an envelope, and all the envelopes were drawn from hollow wheels, by government officials, several days being consumed in the drawing, which took place on the side of a hill in the western part of El Reno. This strange government lottery of land, worth millions of dollars, passed off without serious disturbance, although there were scenes of great excitement as the names of the fortunate prize-winners were announced. For some of the choicest prizes drawn by the early winners, outside offers of from $25,000 to $50,000 were made, but unavailingly.

In the two districts—Lawton and El Reno—in which the reservation land lies, there are, altogether, 13,000 claims, and less than a score of town sites. Naturally, the desire of those who won the choice for farms in the Government drawing was to select their land as close as possible to a prospective town site. The sharpest competition was among those who wished to be near Lawton, which all deemed to be a "city of the future." It is located in a high and dry section, so dry as to be almost waterless; but it is near the Wichita range of hills, which are said to be rich in gold deposits, and doubtless every new settler has the secret hope that Lawton may yet develop into a mining metropolis. It sprang into existence in a few days, and, at the present rate of growth, promises to become a very lively and populous frontier town. Unfortunately, there is a lawless element in Lawton; but there is also a strong, law-abiding, conservative body of settlers, who seem resolved to conduct the town affairs on peaceful principles, and who will likely be successful.

To an occasional correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at Anadarko, Okla., Miss Ida K. Roff, were indebted for the interesting photographs and incident in this page of this issue, presenting scenes and incidents in the great land rush. El Reno, which usually has a population of some 5,000, during the lottery excitement sheltered some 160,000, and the feeding and housing of this great crowd taxed all the resources of the frontier town. In the multitude were many land bores, lawless adventurers, and types of that wild and dangerous element which usually breeds disturbance wherever it appears; but the little town seems to have managed admirably, and got rid of its guests without serious trouble. The first bank and the first pioneer church on a new town site are suggestive of the energy of the settlers, who can transform the wilderness into a scene of populous activity in a few hours, with streets of tents, and "stores" and "hotels" on wheels. That amid all the rush and excitement, and the hot fever of the fight for the land, they did not forget to plant at least a small place for religious services is a cheering sign and speaks well for the future of the newly founded Oklahoma settlements.

A WORKER FROM THE ANTIPODES

The Chicago Institute Secures the Service of a Many-Sided Teacher from New Zealand

HEARTY congratulations are in order to the Chicago Institute on the recent addition to its faculty. It has been felt for some time that the increasing number of students at this famous institution, which Mr. D. L. Moody held in such tender affection as a child of his own, called for an increase in the staff of teachers. After carefully considering the situation, it became evident that any new acquisition should be in the position of Superintendent of the Men's Department. It is a somewhat difficult position, requiring talents of many kinds, besides unusual tact and practical experience.

As has happened so often in Christian work, precisely the man with special qualifications happened to be ready for the position in which those qualifications were specially required. God raises up men now, as he did of old, to carry forward his work, when the men in charge of it rely exclusively on him. Eight years ago, there came to the Institute a student of most interesting personality. He was the son of a Presbyterian minister in New Zealand. He had, as a youth, been put in a subordinate position in a bank, but had worked his way up to the position of manager and was performing its duties with satisfaction to the directors. But he was a man of sterling and aggressive Christian character, who could not be content with financial pursuits. He organized a Y. M. C. A. in the town, and set on foot other enterprises designed to bring religion into the life of young and old. So earnest and devoted and successful was he in this labor, that the local Presbytery appealed to him to give all his time to Christ's cause, and he willingly acquiesced. He accepted the charge of a church, but at the end of six months he began to feel that his usefulness was restricted by the lack of theological training. He, therefore, entered Otago University, but was disappointed with the result. It was not classical and mathematical knowledge he needed, but help in becoming more efficient as a soul-winner. Mr. Moody was his ideal as a leader, and he longed to receive help from him. A notice of the Chicago work happened to come into his hands, and he promptly applied for entrance and sailed for America.

After a course in the Institute, the young New Zealander offered himself to the China Inland Mission for service in China, and was accepted. He went out and labored zealously for four years in that land; but at the close of that period of service he was prostrated by severe illness, and was obliged to go home. After his recovery he took up his work in New Zealand, and for two years labored incessantly. It was then that the Bible Institute, seeking a new helper, heard of his return, and negotiations were begun that have culminated in his coming to Chicago as Superintendent of the Men's Department. To his new work Mr. Todd brings an experience of exceptional value. As a New Zealander he is specially acceptable in an institution in which more than twenty nationalities are represented; as a city mission worker, he has gained knowledge of the difficulties of work in the slums of great cities; and as a returned missionary he can give practical advice to the young men and women in the Institute who have consecrated their lives to foreign missions. The combination of qualifications encourages us to hope for a very successful career for Mr. Todd in his new office.

REV. JAMES H. TODD

Christian Workers' Conference.

THE Northfield General Christian Workers' Conference closed its nineteenth annual session recently. It has been the most successful one ever held there. There never has seemed to be a deeper interest in the meetings than this year. This gathering made an advance on previous conferences, in the introduction of "Institutes." The Institute of Fundamental Christian Doctrine, conducted by Rev. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago; the Musical Institute, in charge of Prof. D. B. Townner, and the "Young People's Institute," over which John Willis Baer presided, proved valuable additions. The chief speakers have been the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, lately of London, and the Rev. Samuel Chadwick, of Leeds, Eng. Other speakers have included Dr. and Mrs. J. Howard Taylor, China Inland Mission; Rev. H. G. Weston, D. D., Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa.; Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D., Washington, D. C.; Rev. C. I. Schofield, D. D., Northfield, Mass.; Rev. H. W. Pope, New Haven, Conn.; Rev. H. C. Mabie, D. D., Boston, Mass.; Commander Booth-Tucker, New York City; Rev. A. C. Dixon, D. D., Boston, Mass., and Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., Brooklyn.

Drs. Campbell Morgan and Chadwick each gave five Bible lectures, arranged in courses, from Tuesday, August 20, to Saturday, August 24. Mr. Morgan gave Bible readings on the Epistles of Peter, and Mr. Chadwick gave Bible readings on Equipment for Christian service.

September is a delightful month in Northfield. Mount Hermon School opened August 30, and Northfield Seminary opens September 12. Many visitors are staying, although the Conferences are now over.

It must be very gratifying to the sons of the late M. D. L. Moody, that their effort to thus continue their father's work has been so heartily and cordially appreciated. The meetings have had their old earnest spiritual tone, and the supreme desire, as aforetime, has been to gain new inspiration and power for service. At the post-conference especially, this desire was very marked.

A POLICEMAN TURNS EVANGELIST

The Rev. Herbert Lowe May Become the Pioneer Police Chaplain---Serving God on the Patrol Wagon

On Saturday, the seventeenth of August, Herbert Lowe completed sixteen years of service on the police force, first of Brooklyn, and, since consolidation, of New York City. During all those years he has given a consistent example of earnest, God-fearing, Christian life, doing his full duty as a policeman, and proving by his work that a man can be a first-rate police officer, and at the same time a sincere and devoted follower of the Saviour, teaching the Gospel to all men and illustrating its principles in practice as well as in profession.

The fact that Mr. Lowe has recently been ordained a minister, and will perform ministerial duties without giving up his place on the police force, has naturally attracted general attention to the man and his career. The spectacle of an evangelist on the patrol wagon, conveying offenders to the station-house, and attending to the trying tasks of a police officer in a thickly populated city, is such a notable illustration of the practical side of Christian life as to be of obvious and widespread interest, and to cause earnest inquiry regarding the man and his career.

Herbert Lowe was born May 22, 1856, and is therefore about forty-five years old. He was appointed on the Brooklyn police force August 17, 1885, and has spent nearly all of the subsequent years in the precinct which the station-house at Ralph avenue and Quincy street is the present headquarters. He has done patrol and patrol wagon duty, and has always been a good officer, esteemed and liked by his superiors and his associates.

"Mr. Lowe's Christianity," said one of his associates, "is not of the aggressive, interfering kind. That could not be tolerated on the police force, where there are so many different religious beliefs represented. He never obtrudes his sentiments upon others; neither, on the other hand, does he conceal his devotion to Christ and his Christian religion. He talks on the subject when it is suggested, but does not force it upon his fellow-officers. We all respect him, because we know him to be sincere. Then, too, he does not make himself out to be different from other people. So far as appearance goes, he is just an everyday policeman, good-natured and genial, ready to give a helping hand, according to his ability, and never shirking his share of duty or responsibility. He is a welcome comforter in the hour of trouble, as many of the force well know, and he has officiated at the funerals of several deceased policemen."

Officer Lowe was not converted suddenly. He had a Christian training from childhood, and with the broadened opportunities which his police duties gave for observing the conditions around him, grew the desire to devote his spare time to Gospel work. He is about five feet ten inches in height, of slender but rugged build, reddish-brown hair, sandy mustache, and light complexion.

REV. HERBERT LOWE

He has a powerful voice, an impressive delivery, and is a good singer, the last-mentioned fact having a good deal to do with the popularity of his services. He is a total abstainer from intoxicating liquors, and does not use tobacco in any form. He delivers addresses at various missions, often by invitation, and sometimes without it, being always welcome. At the Rescue Mission, on Broadway, Brooklyn, he is a favorite speaker.

Officer Lowe lives in modest apartments, with his wife and daughter, at 88 Cornelia street, Brooklyn. His ordination to the ministry took place at a special service held in the Westminster Church, Hopkinson avenue, near Bainbridge street, Brooklyn, by a council of ministers from various churches, who have learned to esteem his evangelical work, and who wished to promote the efficiency of his labors by formally recognizing him as a Christian teacher. The ordination makes no difference in Mr. Lowe's position, either as a policeman or an evangelist, as he will continue his labors in both capacities. He recently spent his ten days' vacation in Clinton Corners, Dutchess County, N. Y., where he preached the Gospel.

A police sergeant at the Stagg street station, who knows Mr. Lowe very well, said to the writer: "I see that one newspaper mentioned as something remarkable, that Officer Lowe was in the habit of kneeling down and saying his prayers among his fellow-officers in the section room. There is nothing remarkable about it. A good many police officers do the same thing and no one would think of interrupting them. I have been on the force many years, and I have no hesitation in saying that the large majority of policemen go regularly to some place of worship. Policemen come in on Sunday morning, after being on duty a good part of the night, put on their civilian clothes and go to church. This is so general as not to be a matter of comment. The policeman who says his prayers regularly in the section room does not lose any standing among his fellows on that account. Indeed, we know that men of that sort can be relied on to do their duty under any circumstances."

Mr. Lowe, the newly-ordained minister-policeman, when questioned by the writer concerning his plans, said he felt that he had a call to preach the Gospel. "It is my desire to bring aid to thousands, by and through God's will. There are many, like myself, who feel keenly the great importance of this work. For years past it has been given me to gather in material which has been drifting away from Christ. As an instrument in God's hands I have preached three hundred sermons, made two hundred sick calls, officiated at twenty-seven funerals and offered prayers hundreds of times. During these labors many souls have been won to Christ. I have gone all the way with him, and where he leads me I shall follow to the end."

PLANTING SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN KANSAS

THE following letter from Mr. Frank Kiser, Missionary in Kansas, of the American Sunday School Union, will be read with much pleasure by many who take a deep interest in the excellent work of this organization:

"My territory here has been filling up with settlers very fast and I have been kept very busy this summer reorganizing the schools in neighborhoods that have thus had their population enlarged. The new settlers have no money and will make better improvements. The crops have suffered for lack of rain, but the wheat crop is good. The western part of my territory is a cattle country, and will be for years to come. It is covered with ranches from two to ten miles square. I visited one county in June, and found but 1,200 people in an area of thirty square miles. My trip covered 450 miles, and used each day to visit and encourage the little

Union Sunday Schools along the way. Once I had to advertise from house-to-house during the day the meeting I was to hold at night. I found the little sod school-house in the midst of a large pasture, and surrounded by barbed wire to keep the cattle out. The nearest dwelling was occupied by a family of new settlers who had charge of a large herd of cattle. The man of the house kept a blacksmith shop. I was entertained here.

"The people seemed to be interested, and I sold and gave away many Bibles and books. I had visited the Superintendent-Elect during the day. The interior of his house was a helpless medley of harness, books, cooking utensils and grain sacks, but the dirt floor was swept clean. He is a bachelor; the civilizing touch of woman was missing in his home, and in spite of his fine herd of cattle he looked lonely and unfortunate. I found some of Moody's and Torrey's best books in his library, and when I looked at them I found the pages well-thumbed from study. He has been a blessing indeed to the neighborhood.

"I reached the Star district at noon. Sixteen years ago the woman who was my hostess had met me as a little girl in the new Sunday School of their neighborhood. She it was who now sent a boy on a horse to advertise the meeting for us. We had a full house, and organized a strong school. I have canvassed six counties, neighborhood by neighborhood, since March, establishing fifteen new schools, with thirty teachers and 1,132 scholars; reorganized about twenty schools and visited fifty-five having 291 teachers and 3,028 scholars.

Of this and other frontier work, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may hear more fully should they care to write to Rev. E. P. Bancroft, Secretary A. S. S. U., 158 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A GOSPEL ARBOR

TEXT -- Nehemiah 8 : 15 :

GO FORTH UNTO THE MOUNT, AND FETCH OLIVE BRANCHES, AND PINE BRANCHES, AND MYRTLE BRANCHES, AND PALM BRANCHES, AND BRANCHES OF THICK TREES, TO MAKE BOOTHS.

It seems as if Mount Olivet were unmoored. The people have gone into the mountain, and have cut off tree-branches, and put them on their shoulders, and they come forth now into the streets of Jerusalem, and on the house-tops, and they twist these tree-branches into arbors or booths. Then the people come forth from their comfortable homes, and dwell for seven days in these booths or arbors. Why do they do that? Well, it is a great festal time. It is the feast of tabernacles; and these people are going to celebrate the desert travel of their fathers and their deliverance from their troubles, the experience of their fathers when, traveling in the desert, they lived in booths, on their way to the land of Canaan. And so these booths also became highly suggestive—I will not say they are necessarily typical, but highly suggestive—of our march toward heaven, and of the fact that we are only living temporarily here, as it were, in booths or arbors, on our way to the Canaan of eternal rest. And what was said to the Jews literally may be said figuratively to all this audience. Go forth into the mountain, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths.

Yes, we are only here in a temporary residence. We are marching on. The merchant princes who used to live in Bowling Green, New York, have passed away, and their residences are now the fields of cheap merchants. Where are the men who fifty years ago owned Washington and New York? Passed on. There is no use in our driving our stakes too deep into the earth; we are on the march. The generations that have preceded us have gone so far on that we cannot even hear the sound of their footsteps. They have gone over the hills, and we are to follow them. But, blessed be God, we are not in this world left out of doors and unsheltered. There are Gospel booths or Gospel arbors, in which our souls are to be comforted. Go forth unto the mountain, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, and build booths.

Olive Branches Needed

Well, now, we are to-day to construct a Gospel arbor, or Gospel booth; and how shall we construct it? Well, we must get all the tree branches and build. According to my text, we must go up into the mount and bring olive branches. What does that mean? The olive tree grows in warm climates, and it reaches the height of twenty or twenty-two feet, a straight stem, and then an off-shoot from that stem. And then people come, and they strip off these branches sometimes, and when in time of war the general of one army takes one of these olive branches and goes out to the general of another army, what does that mean? Why, it means, unsaddle the war chargers. It means hang up the war knapsacks. It is but a beautiful way of saying, Peace!

Now, if we are to-day going to succeed in building this Gospel arbor, we must go into the Mount of God's blessing, and fetch the olive branches, and whatever else we must have, we must have at least two olive branches, peace with God, and peace with man. When I say peace with God, I do not mean to represent God as an angry chieftain, having a grudge against us, but I do mean to affirm that there is no more antagonism between a hound and a hare, between a hawk and a pullet, between elephant and swine, than there is hostility between holiness and sin. And if God is all holiness and we are all sin, there must be a readjustment, there must be a reconstruction, there must be a treaty, there must be a stretching forth of olive branches.

Oh, it does not make much difference what the world thinks of you; but come into the warm, intimate, glowing and everlasting relationship with the God of the whole universe; that is the joy that makes a hallelujah seem stupid. Why do we want to have peace through our Lord Jesus Christ? Why, if we had gone on in ten thousand years of war against God, we could not have captured so much as a sword or a cavalry stirrup, or twisted off one of the wheels of the chariot of his omnipotence. But the moment we bring this olive branch, God and all heaven come on our side. Peace through our Lord Jesus Christ; and no other kind of peace is worth anything.

But then we must have that other olive branch, peace with man. Now it is very easy to get up a quarrel. There are gunpowdery Christians all around us, and one match of provocation will set them off. It is easy enough to get up a quarrel. But my brother, do you not think you had better have your horns sawed off? Had not you better make an apology? Had not you better submit to a little humiliation? "Oh," you say, "until that man takes the first step I will never be at peace with him; nothing will be done until he is ready to take the first step." You are a pretty Christian. When would this world be saved if Christ had not taken the first step? We were in the wrong, Christ was in the right, all right and forever right. And yet he took the first step. And instead of going and getting a knotty scourge with which to whip your antagonist, your enemy, you had better get up on the radiant mount where Christ suffered for his enemies; and just take an olive branch, not stripping off the soft, cool, fragrant leaves, leaving them all on, and then try on them that Gospel switch. It will not hurt them, and it will save you. Peace with God; peace with man. If you cannot take those two doctrines you are no Christian.

But my text goes further. It says: Go up into the mountain and fetch olive branches and pine branches. Now what is Suggested by the Pine Branch?

The pine tree is healthy; it is aromatic; it is evergreen. How often the physician says to his patients: "Go and have a breath of the pines; that will invigorate you." Why do such thousands of people go south every year? It is not merely to get to a warmer climate, but to get the influence of the pine. There is health in it, and this pine branch of the text suggests the helpfulness of our holy religion; it is full of health, health for the mind, health for the soul. It gives a man such peace, such quietness, such independence of circumstances, such holy equipoise. Oh that we all possessed it, that we possessed it now.

But this evergreen of my text also suggests the simple fact that religion is evergreen. What does the pine branch care for the snow on its brow? It is only a crown of glory. The winter cannot freeze it out. This evergreen tree branch is as beautiful in winter as it is in the summer. And that is the characteristic of our holy religion; in the sharpest, coldest winter of misfortune and disaster, it is as good a religion as it is in the bright summer sunshine. Well, now, that is a practical truth. For suppose, if I should go up and down these aisles, I would not find in this house fifty people who had had no trouble. But there are some of you who have especial trouble. God only knows what you go through with. Oh how many bereavements, how many poverties, how many persecutions! How many misrepresentations! And now my brother, you have tried everything else, why do you not try this evergreen religion? It is just as good for you now as it was in the day of prosperity; it is better for you.

You may have had accumulation of sorrow and misfortune. They come in flocks, they come in herds upon your soul; and yet I have to tell you that this religion can console you, that it can help you, that it can deliver you if nothing else will. Do you tell me that the riches and the gain of this world can console you?

The Emblem of Usefulness

But my text takes a step further, and it says, Go into the mountain and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and palm branches. Now the palm tree was very much honored by the ancients. It had three hundred and sixty different uses. The fruit was conserved; the sap was a beverage, the stems were ground up for food for camels; the base of the leaves was turned into hats, and mats, and baskets; and the leaves were carried in victorious processions; and from the root to the top of the highest leaf there was usefulness. The tree grew eighty-five feet in height sometimes, and it spread broad leaves four and five feet long; it meant usefulness, and it meant victory; usefulness for what it produced, victory because it was brought into celebrations of triumph. And oh, how much we want the palm branches in the churches of Jesus Christ at this time! A great many Christians do not amount to anything. You have to shove them off the track to let the Lord's chariots come along.

Usefulness is typified by the palm tree. Ah, we do not want in the church any more people that are merely weeping willows, sighing into the water, standing and admiring their long lashes in the glassy spring. No wild cherry, dropping bitter fruit. We want palm trees, holding something for God, something for angels, something for man. I am tired and sick of this flat, tame, insipid, satin-slippered, namby-pamby, high-tighty religion! It is worth nothing for this world, and it is destruction for eternity. Give me five hundred men and women fully consecrated to Christ, and we will take this city for God in three years. Give me ten thousand men and women fully up to the Christian standard; in ten years ten thousand of them would take the whole earth for God. But when are we going to begin? We all want to be useful. There is a man in the pews that does not want to be useful. When are we going to begin?

Ledyard, the great traveler, was brought before the Geographical Society of Great Britain, and they wanted him to make some explorations in Africa, and showed him all the perils, and all the hard work, and all the exposure, and after they had told him what they wanted him to do in Africa, they said to him, "Now, Ledyard, when are you ready to start?" He said, "Tomorrow morning." The learned men were astonished; they thought he would take weeks or months to get ready. Well, now, you tell me you want to be useful in Christian service. When are you going to begin? Oh, that you had the decision to say, "Now; yes, now." Oh, go into the mount and gather the palm branch.

But the palm branch also meant victory. You all know that. In all ages, in all lands, the palm branch means victory. You are going to be more than conqueror. I who have so many ailments and heartaches, going to be more than conqueror? Yes, unless you are so self-conceited that you want to manage all the affairs of your life yourself instead of letting God manage them. Do you want to drive and have God take a back seat? "Oh no," you say, "I want God to be my leader." Well, then, you will be

More Than Conqueror

Your last sickness will come, and the physicians the next room will be talking about what they will do for you. What difference will it make what they do for you? You are going to be well, everlastingly well, and when the spirit has fled the body, your friends will be talking as to where they shall bury you. What difference does it make to you where they bury you? The angel of the resurrection can pick you out of the dust anywhere, and all the cemeteries of the earth are in God's care. Oh you are going to be more than conqueror.

Do you not think we had better begin now to celebrate the coming victory? Had we not better begin the rehearsal on earth? "They shall hang no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

City of eternity; to thy bridal halls
From this prison would I flee;
Ah, glory! that's for you and me.

My text brings us one step further. It says, go into the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees. Now you know very well—I make this remark under the head of branches of thick trees—that a booth or arbor made of slight boughs would not stand. The first blast of the tempest would prostrate it. So then the booth or arbor must have stout poles to hold up the arbor or booth; and we need for the building of the arbor for this world we must have stout branches of thick trees. And so it is the Gospel arbor. Blessed be God that we have a busy Christianity, not one easily upset. The storms of life will come upon us, and we want strong doctrine, not only love, but justice; not only invitation, but warning. It is a mighty Gospel; it is an omnipotent Gospel. These are the

Stout Branches of Thick Trees

I remember what Mr. Finney said in a schoolhouse. The village was so bad it was called Sodom, and was said to have only one good man in all the village, and he was called Lot; and Mr. Finney was preaching in the schoolhouse, and he described the destruction of Sodom; how the city was going to be destroyed unless they repented; and that there would be rain from heaven of sorrow and destruction unless they repented. And the people in the schoolhouse sat and ground their teeth in anger, and clinched their fists in anger; but before he got through with his sermon they got down on their knees and cried for mercy, for mercy could be found. Oh it is a mighty Gospel, not only an invitation, but a warning; an omnipotent Gospel; stout branches of thick trees.

Well, my friends, you see I have omitted one or two points, not because I forgot to present them, but because I have not time to present them. I have seen you here in the olive branch of peace, here in the myrtle branch of evergreen Gospel consolation, here in the palm tree branch of usefulness and of victory, and here in the stout branches of thick trees. The Gospel arbor is done. The air is aromatic of heaven. The leaves rustle with the gladness of God. Come into the arbor. Come into the booth.

A Few Hints to Fathers

FATHERS are rather overlooked in the matter of advice as to their share in the home training of their children. Yet they, equally with mothers, are responsible for the symmetrical development of their offspring. During the infantile years, the mother is most in the nursery, though all good husbands take their share in the night vigils, which seem inseparable from the early years of the child. In illness and fretfulness, the baby likes to rest in the strong arm of the father, feeling no doubt how restful and soothing is the tenderness of a man, a compassionate tenderness surpassing the love of woman.

It is when their boys and girls—rather lame add their boys than their girls—reach the age when they are wilful and as strong as young colts in the pasture, that fathers need the reminder to be patient. They are apt to have a snippy way of talking to the half-grown lad; they call him Sir, or they snub him, and make fun of his little follies. When he arrives at the period when, to his mother's secret relief, the boy begins to be fastidious, wishing immaculate collars, and keeping his hair and finger nails in order; when he is fully conscious that girls, other than his sisters, are in existence, some fathers find entertainment in fault-finding, in picking fun at the boy's expense, and in being generally disagreeable. A curious antagonism is sometimes discernible between a boy springing up into manhood at his father's, who apparently wants to keep the boy forever a little child. This is to be deplored, for it makes both miserable; puts father and son into relatively false positions, and drives the younger away from the refuge and shelter he ought to have in his father's heart.

Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." The highest conception of fatherhood is given us in the Scriptures, where language labors to convey an imagery of the Divine paternity. The father in the earthly home, protecting, loving, all-enduring, as God is to us, that is an ideal for fathers to keep ever before them!

A father's manner sets the pattern for the family manners. When father is grumpy to mother; when he resists her requests, and manifests no interest in her pursuits; when he refuses help in the hay-field and denies the wife help in her kitchen when he leaves a loose gate hanging, and will not build a lean-to for the laundry work, though a new barn, costing more, is within the scope of his means, father need not expect his sons to be chivalrous, noble or generous men. They will model themselves upon him. If he is angry, they will be mean. If he is selfish, they will be rude. If he is snarling, they will be illiberal. If he never darkens a church door, they will seldom go to the sanctuary. If he be a drinking man, they will become drunkards. A great responsibility lies upon fathers. A kind, benignant, patriotic, noble, Christian father will lead his children straight into the fold. The covenant promises blessings from generation to generation, and those promises are kept when a man can say truly: "As for me and my house we will serve the Lord."

Incoming to the Family Table

No man or boy should ever sit down to dinner in his shirt-sleeves. He may be busy about his outdoor work, but he will lose no time, and he will much more fully enjoy his meal, if, before coming to the table, he wash his face and hands, brush his hair, and put on his coat. From the time that a little fellow puts off the shirt-waist to high short trousers are fastened, his mother should insist on some sort of toilette for a meal, and usually the donning of a neat jacket is a sufficient appreciation of the function. Equally, the girl should bring dainty neatness to the family table, immaculate collars and cuffs, and smooth hair, and that air of freshness which is a distinguishing mark of the well-dressed young woman.

The Red Man at Home

In such colonial studies as Mary Johnston's thrilling romance, "To Have and To Hold," we get picturesque views of the Indian as he was in pre-Revolutionary days. Passing, one moonlight night a few weeks ago, of Indian character and of Indian grievances read "Ramona," Helen Hunt Jackson's wonderful story, which tells facts in the guise of fiction as only a woman of genius knows how. Mrs. Jackson sleeps quietly on a lofty peak in Colorado, but her great book lives to do its good work.

The Indians in our pictures are photographed from real braves and real squaws, and their originals may be found on the camping-grounds the Great Father in Washington still permits them to call their own. Given material comforts and fair treatment these Indians have no wish to go on the war-path, or put on their fantastic paint and feathers.

AN INDIAN ENCAMPMENT

FETE DAY ON THE RESERVATION

through Deerfield, Mass., I thought of the long ago time when it was the scene of a frightful Indian massacre; the settlers tomahawked and scalped beside the ruins of their burning homes; women and children brutally murdered, and a long train of broken-hearted captives goaded through the forests to be tortured in some Indian camp. A bitter series of wrongs had been perpetrated before the savages became ready for these outrages. We have really very little of which to be proud in our whole Indian policy, yet the Indian of 1901 is often a peaceful farmer, living contentedly on his reservation, with schools for his children, churches and ministers, and no smouldering hatred of the paleface. At Carlisle and Hampton the Indian boys and girls show remarkable ability to learn. The white man's vices, the white man's rum, and the white man's cupidity have been at the bottom of nine-tenths of our Indian outbreaks in the past. If you would get a true idea

For Shut-Ins

Among our great company of readers there are not a few patient invalids, shut in from the world, and confined to the narrow borders of their rooms. I heard of one, not long ago, a young girl, who is spending her days in a darkened chamber, allowed to read only five minutes a day. My informant, speaking of her, said: "She is the sunshine of the home, not only bearing her pain with fortitude and resignation, but with cheerfulness and gayety." My heart goes out lovingly to that dear sufferer, and if ever I am inclined to be irritable when little things are not just what I would have them to be, I shall try to think of her, and to emulate the grace of her spirit.

We, who are not shut-in, may well try to assist those who are; may write them bright and entertaining letters, send them flowers, and endeavor to alleviate the tedium of their lives. In a New England village a year ago, I met a very charming woman, whom a slight fall had crippled for all her life; just a misstep, but she would never walk again. Her window looked out on the street, and there she sat, pale but undaunted, a true heroine, and friends never passed without giving and receiving a loving greeting. God bless our Shut-Ins.

The Mystery and Meaning of Life's Struggles

JACOB, A PRINCE WITH GOD

 INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 15. GEN. 32: 1-32
 GOLDEN TEXT—MEN OUGHT ALWAYS TO PRAY AND NOT TO FAINT. LUKE 18: 1

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WHY is it so hard to do right, and so easy to do wrong? Even a child raises the question, as he sees around him so much labor and pain. When the Bible, which answers the question, had not been written, Job cried aloud amid pains, and losses, and bereavements that made him feel as if God was his adversary: "O that mine Enemy had written a book!" God's book of nature, even in our day when science has made its meaning clearer, seemed to Romanes, one of the most learned naturalists, after he had fairly begun to study it, to deny that there is a God. As his "little learning" grew to more, and he saw order and progress everywhere, in sky, and earth, and sea, he was convinced that a thinking, planning Mind, like ours, but greater, must be managing the regular march of spring, and summer, and autumn, and winter, the growth of plants, and animals, and men, and the adaptation of these to each other; but he found so many bloody claws and paws, so many poison fangs, so much of struggle and battle, that he said: "The Creator, though intelligent, cannot be benevolent." He studied on, and at last, in fuller knowledge, discovered that the object of the Creator is not pleasure or pain, but perfection, and that pain is even more than pleasure God's way to perfection. The most beautiful hills, and glens, and valleys, and lakes, and rivers are the work of earthquakes, and volcanoes, and glacier chisels of Omnipotence. The choicest stones and most precious minerals are those that have passed through the fires. Among men, the tropical races, to whom life is easiest, are lowest in manly qualities. And among the sturdier races, the sweetest singers, the noblest characters, are those who have struggled and suffered. Drummond finds two struggles running through all history, from the creation of the first living plant, namely, the father's struggle for life and the mother's struggle for the life of others. The mystery and meaning of these struggles are revealed in the Bible, in which, among other explanations, Jacob's life of successive struggles is interpreted for all ages. Our lesson for today involves three stages of his struggles:

1. The struggle for business success. Gen. 29: 30.
2. The struggle with the consequences of former sins. Gen. 31: 32; 1-24.
3. The struggle into higher life. Gen. 32: 25-32.

A Christian boy ought to desire true success in the largest possible measure in whatever occupation he undertakes, not for the selfish enjoyment or honor it will bring, but as a means of saving God and man.

The Struggle for Business Success

Jacob's history from the early ages tells him the same thing as the latest biographies, that there is no way to success but that of earnest effort. Jacob's life had begun in a struggle with Esau, and that struggle had gone on until Jacob's cunning had over-matched Esau's strength, and Jacob had secured the birthright blessing of his brother. But Esau threatened to kill Jacob, and in personal battle the trader had small chance against the hunter, and so Jacob fled five hundred miles on the pretext that he wanted a wife, which was indeed a half-truth. When forty-eight miles of flight on foot had made him both weary and homesick, God, who had better things in plan for Jacob than cheating and lying, revealed himself above the heavenly steps at Bethel, and put some slight sense of the invisible world into Jacob's selfish life. On he went in a new sense of divine companionship to Mesopotamia, whence Abraham and his own mother had also come. His first adventure was falling in love with Rachel. Even his love-life had its disappointments and its fourteen years of labor, to which other years of farm work were added, twenty-one in all. He had hired as one of Laban's farm "hands"; but he put his head also into his labor, and by observing the laws of stock-breeding, made himself rich and the envy of fellow-workmen. Like many a rich man of to-day, he had begun work with no property but the staff with which he had walked from his old home; but when the time came to leave his master and return to set up for himself, he had "become two bands" of numerous servants and cattle, one of the rich men of his time. He had vowed to pay a tithe to God, and no doubt paid it, for his descendants have continued that practical consecration to this day. The lesson of his business success is that God blesses those who diligently work, and think, and give, and pray.

The next struggle of Jacob reminds us that even well-earned riches do not insure happiness. Jacob's success made the sons of Laban envious. There was murder in their hearts, and it seemed safer even to face Esau's resentment by returning home than to remain. God bade Jacob go.

The Struggle with Consequences of Former Sins

He hesitated, but, as often in like case, his wives said: "Whatsoever God saith unto thee, do;" and in spite of perils behind and before him he started. Whenever we obey, God clears our way. Laban pursued, but his anger was softened by Jacob's divine Guard, and they built together the Mizpah altar, that has been in all ages since the symbol of friendship. But a greater anxiety hung like a thunder-cloud in Jacob's mind. Would Esau, now the chief of four hundred warriors, avenge his wrong of twenty-one years before? A sin is never cancelled by time or even by exile. Nothing settles a wrong but forgiveness. Jacob prayed that God would soften Esau's heart, but he took care to combine faith with works. He sent kindly messages and presents, that were in reality restitution, in a measure, to the brother he had wronged. Even a modern prayer-meeting may find instruction in this practical aspect of Jacob's devotions. How often we pray that God will do things in which we ought to help him, and do not? A little girl prayed God to help her to catch fish, and then dropped in a bare hook. She was greatly disappointed in the result, but at length learned that "worms is God's way." Another little girl prayed God would keep her brother from catching the birds, but even before she prayed, she had taken care to "smash the traps." It is strange that after all the ages of prayer, old as well as young need to be taught that God does for us only what we cannot do ourselves. We pray God to save our friends. Our own words and lives must help. We pray, like Jacob, to be delivered from the consequences of some former fraud. Let us not forget that restitution is God's way.

Jacob had earnestly prayed and wisely worked for the softening of Esau's heart, and it seemed that nothing more could be done. Jacob's caravan had reached the Jordan, and his family and servants had laid down to sleep. On the morrow he would cross into the land God had given to Abraham, to Isaac and to him; but Esau

The Struggle into Higher Life

God had given to Abraham, to Isaac and to him; but Esau

"I WILL NOT LET THEE GO, EXCEPT THOU BLESS ME"

was there, and, therefore, despite promises and prayers, he was too anxious to sleep. Up and down by the brook Jacob walked in the darkness to cool his fevered brow. Suddenly, in the darkness, some one seized him. Was it some emissary of Esau sent to assassinate him? No doubt he thought so, and through the long night wrestled for life. Near the dawn, the Stranger said: "Tell me thy name?" It was a call to conscience, as when Jesus called fallen Peter by his old name "Simon," and spoke it three times to tally his denials. Jacob meant "Supplanter," and the very name was a daily reminder of his old sin. The Stranger said: "You shall no longer be called Supplanter, but Prince, not Jacob, but Israel." There was something in the voice that revealed the friendly and divine nature of the mysterious Wrestler, whom Jacob had up to this time struggled against as a foe. "Tell me thy name!" Jacob exclaimed. The name was not spoken, but it was felt in blessing, as character is always felt with or without words, and in the morning, the new Israel called the place Peniel, the face of God. Here, as often before, it needs to be said that wherever God is spoken of as seen, it must be the embodied Son, since no man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father he hath declared him.

What thronging lessons shine like stars in that night, and flash like a sunrise out of that daybreak! For one thing this story reminds us that sorrows with which we have wrestled as foes, have often proved to be the Christ himself bringing us a sense of weakness only as a prelude to the blessings of joy and power.

It is a mistake to make that long night of struggle the picture of prayer. Important prayer, brief but earnest, is pictured, however, in that morning scene, when at last Jacob learned it was not a foe with whom he had wrestled. When the revealed Christ said: "Let me go, for the day breaketh;"

Jacob replied: "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." His desires had risen above mere earthly prosperity. He hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and to him the beatitude was fulfilled.

It has been too much overlooked that Jacob won the blessing, not while he was struggling for it in his strength, but when he had been crippled and had ceased to struggle.

I struggled and wrestled to win it,
The blessing that setteth me free;
But when I had ceased from my struggle,
His peace, Jesus gave unto me.

God's blessings, whether in conversion, or sanctification or translation to heaven, are in no case earned or won a reward, but are free, undeserved gifts, not of merit, but of mercy. When Thomas Hooker, one of the old Puritan preachers, was dying, some one said to him: "You are going to receive your reward." To which the dying man replied: "I am going to receive mercy."

A child five years old was looking at an illustrated Bible, in which nearly the whole story is told to children in pictures. There was David lifting up his hands to God, and below was the inscription: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks." There was a stream and a little deer. "What does that mean?" said the child's father. The child answered: "The hart can not live without water, and man can not live without God."

Above all else, this story pictures transformation of character. Let us not lose the blessing for ourselves or others by acrimonious debate as to whether the scene stands for conversion or sanctification. Jacob had surely begun a godly life in the feeble way in the vow made at Bethel. But, it is safe to say, he thought of his multiplying flocks rather than of the angels of his vision during the twenty-one years thereafter. This undue passion for property for its own sake, apart from its uses, reminds us of the strange case in Chicago, where a jeweler lost rings and trinkets out of his window night after night, and was unable to trace the thief, until at last a rat was seen by the watchman to carry off a ring. The floor was torn up, and there was found in and about the rat's nest, seventeen rings and numerous trinkets, none of which were of any use to the six baby rats for whom they had been blindly hoarded. As foolish is the miserly passion that seeks wealth for its own sake, rather than as a means of blessing. Jacob, like many another godly man, had hitherto cared too much for vile possessions, too little for the inviolable wealth of character and the supreme privilege of fellowship with God. Now brought him to see at Peniel more fully than at Bethel that this fellowship was possible and desirable, and as he entered into a "second blessing." Whether Bethel and Peniel experiences are always separated or not, let us not debate, but admit that all of us, in the Church and the world, ought to live a "higher life" than we do, let us for the first time, or second, or seventieth, surrender our lives to him who made us to be "created anew in Christ Jesus," resolved by his power to follow all the light we have, to surrender to whatever truth has come to us. Perhaps, we began a Christian life as a duty. Let us start it anew as a privilege, passing, as the apostle directed us to do, from the estate of servants to that of sons.

Conversion, considered as the whole transformation wrought in Christian lives, has been scientifically studied by a professor in the Leland Stanford University, and these are his conclusions in hundreds of testimonies in regard to conversion.

Scientific View of Conversion

"Conversion is primarily an unselfing. The first birth of the individual is into his own little world. . . . In conversion the person emerges from a smaller, limited world of existence into a larger world of being. His life becomes slow up in a larger whole. In another aspect, conversion is the surrender of the personal will to be guided by the larger forces of which it is a part. . . . There is a sudden revelation and recognition of a higher order than that of the personal will. . . . With new insight comes new beauty. Duty and worth awaken love—love for parents, kindred, kins, society, cosmic order, truth, and spiritual life."

Come, O thou traveler unknown,
Whom still I hold, but cannot see!
My company before is gone,
And I am left alone with thee.
With thee all night I mean to stay
And wrestle till the break of day.

Yield to me now, for I am weak;
But confident in self-despair:
Speak to my heart, in blessings speak:
Be conquered by my instant prayer.
Speak! or thou never hence shalt move,
And tell me if thy Name be Love.

My prayer hath power with God—the grace
Unspeakable I now receive;
Through faith I see thee, face to face—
I see thee face to face, and live—
In vain I have not wept and strove—
Thy Nature and thy Name is Love.—DEAN STANLEY

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Wreck of the Treasure Ship

REPORTS of a grievous disaster carried sadness into many a home in the later days of August. The crack Alaskan steamer Islander struck on an iceberg which is believed to have formed part of the Muir Glacier, and went down with about sixty-five persons on board. The steamer left Skagway on August 14, with one hundred and ninety-eight passengers and a large quantity of mail on board. All went well with her until the following morning, when the steamer was approaching Douglas Island. Before daybreak there was a severe gale, which threw the passengers out of their berths. The steamer had struck an iceberg while going at full speed. The shock had so strained the framework of the vessel that the doors of the staterooms could not be opened. Some of the passengers broke the windows, and crawling through them, made their way on deck. One of the crew went below at the risk of his life and liberated some of the passengers by smashing in the door with an axe. There was a scene of terrible confusion on deck. The captain, not realizing the danger as disputing with the pilot, who wanted to run the steamer on the beach, or at least lower the boats. The captain countermanded the orders the pilot gave and ordered the boat headed for Hilda Bay. In a few minutes, however, the inrush of water at the bow caused the stern to lift, and soon the propeller was high out of water and the steamer was helpless. Then there was a wild rush for the boats. There was great confusion, for the steamer was gradually sinking by the head and every man knew that the minutes were precious. The boats were soon filled, and cries were raised to push off. Many jumped into the water and supported themselves on the floating wreckage. In twenty minutes from the time the steamer struck she went down by the head. It was significant to see in a few brief minutes how the passengers acted with their treasure. Most of them had their gold dust in bags or in satchels. Men who had dust worth forty thousand dollars packed in a press-suit case promptly broke it away and jumped overboard. Another, who had a money bag, still clung to it as he jumped and went down with his treasure. The majority, however, flung away their gold to save their lives. It was a rare alternative to many, but a rare time when hesitation was fatal. Such times may occur in spiritual experience, when it is only by sacrificing something very precious, that is menacing the safety of the soul, that eternal safety can be attained:

It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast to hell. (Matt. 5: 29).

Written Property

A singular instance of forgetfulness on the part of a lawyer came to light in New York last week. The city is erecting a new avenue in the borough of the Bronx, which is to be known as Whittier avenue. Compensation is being made to the owners of the land thus appropriated. One owner, who was dissatisfied with the amount in his case, employed a lawyer to defend his rights. In examining the map he noticed that the adjoining lots, a part of which had also been taken by the city, belonged to some one unknown. In tracing the title of his client's property, he found that the adjoining lot belonged, two hundred and fifty years ago, to a well-known New York family. The present representative of the family is a member of an eminent legal firm in the city, whose specialty is real estate. His attention was called to the award by the city to unknown owner and he looked up the record. He found that the property belonged to him, though for more than fifty years no mention of it had been made in any legal instrument. The entire property comprises about four acres, and has suddenly become valuable because of the proposed improvements which will shortly involve the city acquiring another part of it, when Randall avenue will be extended. It is strange that a man who has protected the interests of others, and has done so much to establish the validity of so many claims, should have overlooked his own rights. People are usually more careful about their property, though they often suffer their own spiritual interests to go uncared for, even while they are caring for those of others:

They made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept. (Cant. 1: 6).

The Cost of Finding America

A noted German scholar has an interesting article in a scientific journal on the discovery of America, based on the examination he has made of the Spanish archives. He states that in the original documents concerning the voyage of Columbus, the contribution of the Queen toward the expedition was given invariably as 1,140,000 maravedis. One hundred years ago a maravedi was the equivalent of about one-fifth of a cent, but in the fifteenth century, before the coin had been debased, he learned, it was worth almost three-fourths of a cent. In the coinage of the present time, therefore, Queen Isabella's contribution was approximately $7,500. The annual salaries of officers of the first transatlantic fleet are calculated by Prof. Ruge to have been: Admiral, $320; Captain, $192; Pilot, $135 to $153; Surgeon, $38. Never in the world's history has there been so great a disproportion between the value of a paid to no useful purpose, and had better have been given to some lawyer to defend the accused man in a legitimate way. There is reason to fear that many will discover when they die that they have been similarly deluded. Those who have trusted in rites, and ceremonies, and sacraments, and the absolutions of priests, will learn that only through Christ himself is there salvation.

Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved (Acts 4: 12).

Money to be Burned

A press despatch from St. Paul, Minn., reports the death of an old farmer who has left an eccentric will. He directs that after his debts, and a few small legacies, are paid, his executors shall gather the remainder of his money and burn it to ashes. The deceased was eighty-two years of age. Last year he sold a farm for twenty-five thousand dollars, and after making payments to the amount of ten thousand, he went home and burned the remainder. It is estimated that the balance in the hands of the executor after paying legacies and debts, will be fully seventy thousand dollars. As the farmer left nothing to his nephew, his only known relative, the will will be disputed and will probably be set aside. No court would be likely to uphold it. No one could benefit by it, but the Washington Government or the bank that had issued the notes. If he did not wish his relatives to have the money, he might have bequeathed it to others who need money very badly. But there are some men who care nothing for the welfare of their kind, and are indifferent to the suffering around them. Such men show by their conduct that they have no participation in the divine life:

Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? (1. John 3: 17)?

BRIEF NOTES

Several new Christian Endeavour Societies have recently been formed in Brazil. It is hoped to federate them into a national union. A national C.E. organ, O Esforço Christao, is already being published.

Leprosy is increasing in no fewer than 49 Russian governments and districts. The greatest number of lepers in a single government is found in Lithuania, where there are 609 cases under medical isolation. There are 201 in Courland, 124 in Astrakhan, and 121 in Kuban district.

Tewfik Bey, who has been Turkish Governor of Jerusalem for three years, has assured the Sultan that it is not the Jews that the government has to fear, and that the Jewish colonies are a benefit to the country. The new governor enjoys the reputation of being just and free of religious prejudice.

Evangelist H. D. Kennedy, of Peterboro, Ont., and John M. Whyte, of Toronto, have conducted a series of remarkable Gospel meetings during the last few months throughout Ontario; 1,000 persons have confessed Christ.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, replying recently to a Christian man who refrained from political action on the ground that politics were corrupt, said: "You are the salt of the earth, and if political life is corrupt, so much the more reason that godly men should touch it with the antiseptic salt of their consecrated endeavor."

Persons interested in promoting the passage of an anti-polygamy amendment to the Constitution may procure forms of petition for circulation in their own neighborhoods by writing to the Willett Press, 142 Fifth avenue, New York. They will be sent postpaid to any address at the rate of ten copies for twenty-five cents; one hundred copies for $1.25.

Count Henry Kattenhauber, a well-known literary man of Austria, has published a book about anti-Semitism from the standpoint of Christianity. The learned count proves that anti-Semitism is against the doctrine of Christ, and that no good Christian can hate the Jews. This work is expected to make a great impression upon the aristocracy, to which the count belongs.

The Rev. Naomi Tamura, of Tokio, Japan, a former Princeton student, and a friend of Rev. Dr. Roberts, Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, writing under date of July 2, says: "We are witnessing a wonderful work of God in our city. Over 5,000 people have asked prayer for their salvation within five weeks. It is a wonderful revival. We never saw such manifestation of the Holy Spirit since the first missionary came to Japan forty-two years ago."

Millionaires disposed to take a hand in improving the condition of the poor in great cities may be encouraged by the recent report of the New York City and Suburban Homes Company, which has built model tenements on both the east and west sides of the city. It earned five per cent. on the investment last year. Its loss from vacancies was about three and a half per cent. of the gross rentals. From bad debts the discount is not over half of one per cent. in the worst quarter, and one-fifth of one per cent. in the better district.

discovery and its cost. But the cost was not covered by the expenditure in money. It included the faith and self-sacrifice of a brave man. It is by those qualities and not by money that the world has always gained its choicest treasures. The greatest of all boons—the heavenly world beyond the grave was brought within reach of the human race by infinite self-sacrifice.

We were not redeemed by corruptible things, as silver and gold; but with the precious blood of Christ. (1. Peter 1: 18, 19).

The Pull Failed

A singular story was told in a New York court last week. The defendant was a saloon-keeper in the city, who was charged by a woman with having defrauded her of three hundred and eighty dollars. She said that her brother was arrested some months ago on a charge of robbing a wealthy Brazilian gentleman. She was told that the saloon-keeper was a man of influence in the court, and that if she gave him money he could prevent her brother being convicted. After some bargaining, according to her story, the amount to be paid the saloon-keeper was fixed at four hundred dollars, all but twenty dollars of which was paid. The woman said that it was completely wasted, for her brother, at the trial, was convicted and sentenced to a long term in the Elmira Reformatory. Whether the saloon-keeper ever received the money, or having received it, was unable to influence the judge, the court will be required to determine. It is obvious that if the money was paid, it was

Little Miss Thirteen Thousand

THIRTEEN was not an unlucky number for Nellie Smith, when (followed by three ciphers) it went opposite her name on the roll of little guests entertained at Mont-Lawn, our Children's Home on the Hudson. Here is her story, as told by the missionary who brought her, her brother and sister, to the Bible House: "The mother is an invalid; she looks deathly pale, is very weak, and has lost her hearing. The father is industrious, sober and honest; the factory where he was employed shut down, and he has been out of steady work for a good while. What little they had saved, went for medicine and doctor's bills. There are four children, the oldest ten, the youngest two. I found them all very weak—'from lack of food,' the doctor whom I called in, said. The children had not tasted milk for a long time, and had had no eggs since Easter. Some days they had gone all day without food, waiting hopefully for their father's return at night; but when he came, he could not always get it for them, and they went hungry to bed. They are not of the kind to beg or let their wants be known. They could not beg if they tried. They don't know how.

break their hearts not to go. Polly delayed me. She has no mother, and fixed up her bundle herself. Only a few rags are in it; but fix it she would. She has on a dress somebody gave her last winter; it's hot enough to melt her, but she feels quite fine. Everything Frank has in the world is tied up in that handkerchief. I bought the waist he wears. Richie's mother is good as gold, and works her fingers to the bone; he has a change of garments." Richie has lived in a plaster jacket for three years; his little face, encased in a steel frame which holds his head in position, is too sad a picture for these pages. He is one of the sweetest children who ever went to Mont-Lawn; everybody loved him. He had never played on the grass, never seen a flower growing up out of the ground, never heard a wild-bird sing, before going to Mont-Lawn. Eight people live in his home, which consists of one room and two large closets—a dark and a light one. The mother has no machine; she makes all their clothes with her fingers, and takes in washing. The baby has been sick and she has been ailing. Polly was run over when three years' old by a trolley.

"PAPA'S HOUSEKEEPER"

"MISS THIRTEEN THOUSAND"

FRANK, THE CRIPPLE

That quiet, deaf mother, living on the top floor of a high tenement, is not one to draw to herself the attention of charity workers. They have all been struggling on cheerfully, hoping for better things. When I told them THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would take the three older children to the country, their gratitude was boundless. When I called before the day appointed for their journey, I found the mother without her wrapper; she had cut it up—the only outer garment she had—and was making slips for the two little girls to wear to Mont-Lawn. So many accidents had happened to Nellie's only dress—the one she has on in the picture—that the most patient needle could not reclaim it; and the poor mother saw but this one way to clothe her children. When I came to take them to the Bible House, they were tidy and ready, looking over the banisters for me, and giving feeble shouts of joy. On their return home after their outing, brown and strong, in good clothes, their parents' pleasure was too great to be described. The relief from anxiety and expense during the ten days their children were cared for, had tided that family over a very hard place, and are thankfully remembered, even though the father is getting regular work again. "Little Miss Thirteen Thousand"—as gentle little Nellie was sometimes called by those around her—and her brother and sister, had a very happy time at Mont-Lawn. They had eggs and milk in plenty, and swung in the scups, and played on the grass to their hearts' content. Sad as her story is, the lives of some of her little playmates hold darker shadows yet.

Dr. Delaney, of Catherine Street Mission, brought Polly, Richie and Frank to the Bible House. The good doctor was out of breath: "I hope we're not too late for the boat to-day," she said. "It will

The writer went to Polly's home, and found that she is her father's "housekeeper". She sweeps, scrubs and cooks. Frank's home was visited; but here the curtain must be drawn, for the drink curse is on that abode, misnamed "home," and a description of its wretchedness, like the picture of poor Richie's face, is something our readers must be spared; but they will be glad to know that Frank has been invited to a second outing at Mont-Lawn. He was not in when the call was made; he was found on the street, and his face grew radiant when he saw that his CHRISTIAN HERALD friends had remembered him.

Corinna interested the workers at our Home intensely. With her flashing, dark eyes, her straight, black elf-locks, and her thin, sharp face, she looked like a little witch. Such bitter words she could say! and such a strange, hard, rebellious spirit she showed! She seemed to think every one's hand was against her and that her hand must be against every one. Her father had been killed by one he thought his friend; she had witnessed the deed; hatred for her father's slayer was consuming her; it was painful to hear falling from childish lips the vindictive, vengeful expressions she would utter. "When I'm big, I'll kill him!" she would say of the murderer. Her teacher talked with her about forgiveness. "Forgive?" she exclaimed. "We Italians never forgive!" How our Housemother and her helpers labored over this poor, passionate troubled little soul! How they prayed for her! and, at last, how thankful they were when they saw the fruits of their loving-kindness appear in the softening of the warped child-nature. One day, with tears in her dark eyes, the little girl said, with quivering lips: "For Jesus' sake, I forgive!" The change in her character was quick and radical; her teachers could hardly believe the evidence of their senses when she became sweet, gentle and submissive.

These are typical cases; their histories are not recited that sympathy may be concentrated upon these particular children, but that these may stand as representatives of a host of little ones needing and receiving help from the generous readers of this paper, who have aided us in bringing sunshine into the lives of over 13,000 children of the tenements, hundreds of whom have lives as sad as any here portrayed. Suppose that army of 13,000 and more could stand up at once and thank you! Would not that chorus rise above your head and even to Him that sitteth upon the Throne! Perhaps, when you stand in heaven before Him who said: "Suffer little children to come unto me," you may meet souls who will testify: "I was first shown the way thither when a little child at Mont-Lawn. Then I showed the way to others, and have brought many with me to heaven." Will others help us save the children? It costs such a little sum to send a child to Mont-Lawn for a ten days' outing—only $3. $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $15 five; $30 ten—a whole company. Cash contributions should be addressed to this office; clothing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, New York.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Mexico, N. Y.

By looking to my Saviour every morning and evening, and in fact all through the day, I find that he comforts and helps me, and I feel that through his goodness I am finding the strength I need. He is helping me to overcome an awful temptation, and I feel confident that he will fully deliver me.

A. M. W., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

I have received many answers to prayer, and while as a rule I have received just what I asked for, I have faith enough in God's judgment to believe that when petitions were not answered just as I desired, that he was still faithful and answering for my good.

B. R., Staunton, Va., writes:

For years I had been praying for the conversion of my father, who was not a Christian. He was over 80 years old, a cripple, almost blind, and quite deaf. The thought of his dying out of Christ was a terrible burden to me. I prayed day and night. Many friends prayed, also. God heard and answered. In May last my father was converted, and a great peace came to him before he died, May 29.

M. C. S., Mt. Pleasant, N. J., writes:

Our little boy was critically ill for a long time. One day we feared he could not live until night. While sitting by him I picked up a CHRISTIAN HERALD and read a remarkable answer to prayer, and that led me to beseech God to glorify himself in saving my little one. The child lived—it seemed almost a miracle that he should—and so I would gratefully magnify God's power and goodness. I thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for its "Answered Prayer" column that has helped me so much.

M. M. B., Hickman, Neb., writes:

I thank my dear Father in Heaven for answered prayer. Although he has seen best to take our little daughter, our only child, who was so dear to us, to his heavenly home, we believe he doeth all things well. A prayer may not be answered just in the way we ask, but God knows best.

F. S. O., Virginia, writes:

I prayed in faith to my dear Heavenly Father to restore a dear one to a better life. He heard my prayers and answered.

A. H. L., Etherton, Ills., writes:

When I went to God with my broken heart, after the death of a loved son, and asked him to take away the cruel pain of bereavement that was like a knife in my heart, and told him I was willing to give up my boy to him, he took the sharp anguish right away. That was over four years ago. Often since then, when troubles came, I have gone to Jesus, and found a sweet relief.

E. C. R., Hernando, Fla., writes:

About forty years ago I heard a young girl say: "When there is a revival going on, I often covenant with a friend to pray for the conversion of certain ones, and whenever we have done so, they have never failed to be converted." I was young then, and her words strengthened my faith. I am old now, and have often seen God's promise in Matt. 18:19 fulfilled; and not only so, but even my poor, imperfect, but earnest prayers, have time and again been answered. I do not believe that any earnest prayer is unavailing.

Reader, Coffeyburg, Mo., writes:

Recently we had an awful storm of wind, rain and hail—the worst I ever witnessed—I did not know what minute our house would go. I earnestly prayed to God to save our lives and home. He heard my prayer.

S. S., Illinois, writes:

Over a year ago I laid a petition before God. He has answered it, and has done even more—he has accepted me as his child.

A. O., Vallejo, Calif., writes:

Last summer, a lady boarding at our house took THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and so I came to read the letters telling of answered prayer. I was in great trouble and prayed the Lord to relieve me. He heard and answered, and I was cured.

HEALTHY SCHOOLMA'AM.

Found Out How to Feed Himself.

any school teachers, at the end of their work, feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual and unless they are well fed and fed upon properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher at Gobleville, Mich., has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the session, until in the last year she has made use of Grape-Nut Food with the result that she closed the year as a robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 90 pounds to 126; her nerves strong, her bright and cheery, and really a wonder to her friends, who constantly comment upon her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she had almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape-Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence in plain fact of the value of Grape-Nuts Food for building the brain and nerve centres.

The name of the teacher can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Pushing Relief Work in China

THE RELIEF MESSENGER, RETURNING FROM SHANSI, REPORTS BETTER PROSPECTS THERE—OUR MISSIONARIES GRATEFUL

AFTER a tedious journey, Mr. Edgar Allen Pierce, who was commissioned by the China Famine Relief Committee last month to carry relief to the sufferers in Shansi, has returned to Peking, having safely accomplished the work he undertook. A cable despatch to the New York Sun from Peking, dated August 19, says Mr. Pierce reports the Province of Shansi as peaceful. There has been rain, and the crop outlook is promising.

Letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Tientsin show that the committee is working most energetically. Chairman Smith, under date July 12, writes that the relief party had then left for Shansi. He explains:

"A Shanghai lawyer (Mr. Edgar Allen Pierce) was intending to go to Shansi to look into charges against a Chinese official for whom he was retained, and he kindly offered to carry with him as luggage a part of the 'sycee' silver. I enclose his letter. . . . All the gentlemen (except one military officer) are missionaries, with a gigantic work of reconstruction to do, entirely aside from relief. I think they may count on all the help which the Governor of the province can give them, and he is most friendly. With regard to the province of Shensi, where the famine has been most desperate, the difficulties there will be great, but Mr. Duncan is a most energetic Scotchman. . . . You may rest assured that your distributors are doing the best they can, in difficult conditions."

Mrs. Arthur H. Smith also writes from Tientsin, July 9, as follows:

"A more gracious, timely, beautiful gift from the West to the East, there could not be. In the name of Shantung, where Christians were shuddering for more than a year in daily terror of attack; hiding, flying, mothers wearing the skin from elbows and knees as they crept about, hushing baby into silence among the crops which were so low the women dared not stand; within sight and sound of Boxer terrors for days, but kept by the same God who kept the little ark in the bull-rushes long ago; where the sick and the aged died a thousand deaths from fear; in the name of Shantung, I thank you."

"In the name of Shansi, where feeble little flocks saw the relentless wolves carry off their shepherds and shepherdesses, leaving by-and-by only stripped and headless bodies to make their mute appeal to Heaven; where the poor Christians 'wandered in deserts and in mountains and in dens and caves of the earth,' homeless, friendless, moneyless, without food or clothing or bedding all the bitter winter, and were surrounded by those who reviled them if they ventured to beg; where they were given the opportunity either to recant or to drink the blood of the martyred missionaries and be beheaded; in the name of Shansi, I thank you."

"In the name of Shensi, sitting appalled amid horrors which remind us of the siege of Jerusalem, I thank you."

"Warm, grateful thanks to every kind heart which went out to this adopted country of ours in its time of sorest need."

"With the slow, difficult, dangerous overland travel, it may be weeks before our dear almoners arrive at their journey's end and begin their work of distribution. The amount of your benefactions took away our breath at first. I wondered if the Recording Angel had an extra large fountain pen to set them down, and I thought how one and another up yonder would look glad and say, 'I put it into that man's heart to give that money; God sent me to him.'"

"Yours, Gratefully for China,

"EMMA DICKINSON SMITH."

The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following letter:

CHINESE LEGATION, WASHINGTON, Aug. 21, 1901.

MY DEAR SIR:—Referring to my letter of the 9th instant, in which I gave emphatic denial to a statement erroneously attributed to me that no famine now existed in China, I beg to state that the famine is not confined to the provinces of Shansi and Shensi, but that it exists also in the southern part of Chihli. I have just received a letter from His Excellency, Mr. Sheng, Director General of the Telegraph Systems of China, confirming what I have already heard of the famine ravages in some of the districts lying to the south of Peking. He states that the people are in extreme distress and suffering; that they wander about homeless and famished; that for want of sustenance, women and children are being sold; and that in some extreme cases the people are reduced to such a degree of starvation, that they would almost resort to eating human flesh. He adds that funds are sadly needed.

As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is still carrying on the noble work for the relief of the famine, I trust that you will be good enough to direct the attention of the relief workers to that part of Chihli also, where suffering exists, and that, if you deem it necessary, you will make a further appeal to the benevolent and generous American public for more funds, which no doubt would be readily forthcoming, if the facts are made known.

Very truly yours, WU TING FANG.

Evangelist Bates, Probably the Oldest Native Spiritual Veteran—His Record of 400 Camp Meetings

ONE of the best known and most devoted evangelists of to-day is the Rev. L. B. Bates, D.D., the venerable father of Hon. John L. Bates, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts. In his seventy-third year, he is a giant alike in stature, and is tireless in his efforts to point men and women to the Way, the Truth, and the Life. He was born in 1829, at North Easton, Mass. His father, Rev. Lewis Bates, was for sixty-one years an itinerant minister of the M. E. Church. Dr. Bates was converted when but seven years of age, licensed as an exhorter at seventeen, entered the local ministry at nineteen, entered the Providence Conference at twenty-one, was chaplain to Bristol County prison one year, five years chaplain of the Massachusetts Third Regiment, and was transferred to the New England Conference in 1872. Up to date, he has conducted, during these fifty-three years of his ministry, in the vicinity of 37,000 religious services, which includes nearly 400 camp-meetings. His field of labor has been chiefly in New England; but he has preached throughout New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the Southern States. His meetings in the South and in New York during the past winter will be remembered by thousands.

Dr. Bates has been the dedication preacher for more than 300 churches, and has raised over $1,100,000 for church buildings; for the benevolent objects of the church more than $100,000; for the needy, poor, shipwrecked sailors, more than $100,000. A few years ago he went abroad, traveling 16,000 miles in four months. For sixteen years he was pastor of the East Boston Bethel. When he resigned in 1894, the church had the largest Sunday School and the largest regular congregation of any M. E. church in Boston. During his last ten years as pastor of this church, the Sabbath evening congregation averaged one thousand people.

For the past three years Dr. Bates has given himself up wholly to evangelistic work. He is president of the Christian Workers' Union of New England, and has been their leader for twelve years. In more than twenty-five years he has circulated over 10,000 copies of the Bible and over 10,000 copies of the Gospels, and for more than forty-five years he has averaged preaching or conducting more than one service for every day.

Dr. Bates has always been strongly identified with the temperance cause. Always the prisoner's friend, his visits to jails have been numbered by the thousand. He has become the bondsman of more than 100 men, and he says that only nine have disappointed him. Thousands, at the stirring invitation of this veteran man of God, have turned to the old-fashioned Gospel for guidance.

During the past winter, Dr. Bates conducted many notable evangelistic services through the South, and hundreds of conversions were among the substantial results of his labors at Chattanooga, Tenn.

A KURDISH BRIDE AT HOME

By DR. HANNAH G. YOSEPH, Our Correspondent at Maragha, Persia

"SALAM Aleikum," I said as I entered the chamber of Nusiati Hanim, the Kurdish bride of whom I wrote in a previous letter. "Aleika Salam," a dozen voices responded.

DR. HANNAH YOSEPH

One of the ladies asked if I thought the bride pretty. "Yes, of course she is pretty," I said. This was repeated to the bride; she looked quite pleased, and a few minutes later she asked: "Who is the prettier, my sister-in-law or I?" The former was older, but prettier. "Both of you are pretty; but I believe we should always say a bride is prettier," I answered. She looked quite disappointed. From her childhood she had been used to flattery and adulation from her slaves and tenants. I was told that a few days after she was brought to her new home, her husband sent his "White Beard" to invite her to his apartments. On hearing the invitation, she said many unbecoming words. "Does he not know that I am the daughter of Mer Panj [commander of five thousand]. Let him come to my feet; I will not go," was her message to her husband. All the maids and servants are afraid of her.

As we were talking, a small pail filled with live coals was brought in, and a powder sprinkled upon them produced a thick and disagreeable smoke. This pail was carried around the bride.

The powder is made up of pounded seeds of a plant called ouzarlik, which is thought to be a charm against the evil eye, especially when burnt. I felt uneasy and uncomfortable. A sweet-looking old woman said, "Hakim Hanim [lady doctor], don't feel bad about our burning ouzarlik, because it is our custom to burn it at all times and occasions. Don't you know that even the eye of a fond mother undermines her child's health? Fatima Hanim, my sister, when she looks in a mirror, gets one of those fearful headaches of hers. Her own eye influences her so badly."

"The loving eye of God," I said, "sees and protects us every minute, and nothing whatever can possibly do us any harm. In the light of the shining sun, or in the darkness of night, we fear nothing when God is near us. Our Holy Books teaches us to believe in Christ and do right and to be not afraid. Why should you suffer yourselves to be made unhappy with continual fear?"

"Let me cut your speech with sugar (this is the Kurdish form of 'excuse me'); but I know a woman who has such a bad eye, that if she looks upon a stone it will break to pieces," the old lady affirmed.

A remarkable old lady, over a century old, an aunt to Moshbahy Dwan (the bridegroom), who cannot walk, who can hardly hear or see, and who always has two servants to carry her around, told me proudly, "I have made a journey each new year to bring a bride to my nephew, as pretty and rich as this one," pointing to the bride.

"Please tell the old lady," I said to the interpreter, "Torat [Old Testament] which you Moslems believe and honor, tells us that God created in the beginning one man that is one husband, and one woman that is one wife. If he wanted the man to have more than one wife he would have given more than one. Many hundred years later Christ taught men that it was the will of God to have only one wife."

Two or three young ladies said, "Haray willati [a Kurdish oath], she is right. Our religion is bad. It is for men, not for women!" "No new wife dare to come to this house now," the bride said. "The girls of our family never allow such a thing."

Returning to my room, I noticed that Stara, the little serving maid, was crying. I pressed her to tell me what was the matter. "I am mourning," she said, "for my black kismet [fate, luck]. My mother is dead, and my father has no son, and is an opium-eater. I have also a sister of seven years. My father sold everything and gave it for opium, and he got into heavy debt and could not support us. So my sister and myself were both sold to our present master (Moshbahy Dwan), and I was made a sigha [some kind of wife] to himself, and my sister to his son. I was very happy, as I was dressed, treated and loved like a lady; but soon he got tired of me, and never even inquired about me—it is as if I were dead and gone. Another favorite took my place, and she too, like me, was loved, then displaced by another. Do you remember, Doctor," she continued "that very beautiful girl of nearly my age whom Agha [Master] sent to you about her throat?" "Yes, I do. What about her?"

"While she was playing on the street with other children, she struck a boy in the eye.

His father beat the girl; then the girl's father killed the boy's father. Both families were Agha's tenants, therefore the blood belonged to Agha, and to the family of the deceased Agha paid the blood money, and he took the girl to himself. She too had her happy days, which were nipped in the bud, when she was deserted like many others. Till the coming of this bride, everybody said she was the most beautiful girl ever seen. Now she lives all alone in a ruined building, sitting there in warm days and cold, waiting for Agha."

"What is your master going to do now with so many slave girls?"

"Those of us who are young are kept in the house. Sometimes he gives one of us as a gift to a friend or a guest. Sometimes he gives one of us to his servant, or to any other man that does him a service. Sometimes he exchanges us for a house, cow, land, or anything he may fancy; or, he may kill us if he pleases. Yesterday he gave one of us to his secretary."

The afternoon was so beautiful that I thought I would like to climb the hills. The dogs here are very fierce, and being much afraid of them, I asked Stara to go and ask the "White Beard's" permission to accompany me on a walk. In a little while she returned with an old woman, who said, "Hakim Hanim, Agha says, tell Hakim Hanim even if she cuts the maid's head off no one will say a word. Do with the maid as you like."

I wanted to be alone except for Stara, and knowing that the village people would gather about us, we went around the village, hoping they would not see us. But in a few minutes, after we were comfortably seated on the rocks, women and children came and sat by us. They wanted me to feel their pulses and look at their tongues. As I was talking to them through an interpreter I overheard a group speaking a language that sounded very much like my mother tongue, the Syriac. "Surely," I thought, "Kurds have kidnapped some historian girls." I was told that "they were Jews," the people of God, the ancient and beloved people. How I felt drawn toward them. "What do you do over here among these hills?" I asked a young Jewess who held a beautiful child in her lap.

"Our owners (husbands) bring goods from the city, and sell them to the villagers."

"How many families of you are here?"

"There were four, but all of one family became Kurds."

"Were they forced to become Moslems, or did they choose of their own free will?"

The Jewess looked at me long and sadly, with eyes full of tears, but did not answer. I came down with heavy heart, yet acknowledging God's wonderful protection of the Jew. If it was not for God's love and everlasting purpose, not a Jew would have been left in Persia or Turkey.

To-day, after breakfast, Nusiati Hanim again sent for me. I took with me the Perry pictures, which my friend, Mrs. R. M. Eustace, of New York, sent me. After the usual greetings I began to show them and explain. Every time I would say, "This is Isa [Jesus]," some of the ladies would kiss the picture reverently, then put it upon their eyes and forehead. When pictures about the crucifixion were exhibited, Fatima Hanim, the mother of Moshbahy Dwan, moaned, "Astafia illallah! Astafia illallah! [God forbid! God forbid!]"

It was time for me to return to Miandab, and I asked my servants to engage three horses; but no one in the village dared hire us any. They said, "Agha [Moshbahy Dwan] always gives his own horses to carry his own guests."

I called the "White Beard," and sent him to ask Moshbahy Dwan to permit us to go. He returned with the message, "Agha asks Hakim Hanim is she tired of us? We must have been treating her badly."

Another guest said to me, "This is Moshbahy Dwan's custom. He detains his guests as long as possible. A messenger who brought a letter for Agha two months ago is here now; so are many idle people who come and make their homes here. This chief is considered one of the most hospitable chiefs of Kurdistan. He will detain you for months."

After understanding the situation, I sent my servant to thank Agha for his kindness and hospitality, and to tell him that I had promised my patients and friends in the city to be back in a month, and if I could go no other way I would have to walk. Upon which the horses were loaded and made ready to start. The host himself came and said, "I feel guilty, and am afraid that our time was taken up so much with the wedding that we could not serve you as we ought."

When I went to say good-bye to the bride, she took my hand, called for the White Beard, and said, "Go tell Agha that I will not let Hakim Hanim go." And to a maid she said, "Quickly go and tell the servants to unload the horses, Hakim Hanim is not going."

Going down I found the horses unloaded, had their burdens quickly restored, and in a little while we were enjoying the bracing air of the hills as we journeyed homeward.

TRUE HONOR*

Source in Humble Service in the desire of Pleasing God Rather than Winning Praise from Men

FEW persons, even among Christians, fully attain the sublime elevation which Jesus describes in his reproach of the Jews who cavilled at the command he gave to the impotent man. Not only did he heal the man on the Sabbath, but by running counter to their Sabbath-keeping prejudices, but he told the man to carry away his bed, which was a direct violation of the law, which prohibited the being of burdens on the Sabbath. The law was certain to provoke criticism. In proportion as the Jews failed to grasp the spirit of the law, they became more insistent on the observance of the letter of the law. The same tendency still survives. Among ourselves, people, whose pride and intolerance are flagrantly unchristian, are conspicuous for their rigid adherence to the details of the rites of religion. A curious illustration of the same spirit is to be found in a traveler in Italy. It is that of a peasant in the mountain districts, who, on a long night journey of many miles, told a priest to whom he could confess a venial sin, which lay as a heavy burden on his conscience. He had accidentally swallowed a fly on a day on which his church had enjoined abstinence from animal food. The poor man's distress was pitiable; he felt sure his soul would be lost. The priest, before giving him absolution, asked where the penitent lived. Finding that he came from a district in which many travelers had been robbed and murdered about that time, inquired whether he had been concerned in any of the crimes. The man admitted freely that he had; but he thought so lightly of the matter that they seemed to him too trivial to be included in his confession. His swallowing of food on a fast day seemed to him much more heinous than murder and robbery. So observance of the letter of the law may become so slavish as to enslave the conscience. The men to whom such talk were of the same order. They would have been horrified if they had learned that a tithe had not been paid of the herbs with which they seasoned their food, but they thought lightly of pouring widows' houses.

While denouncing such formalism, Jesus had occasion to point out how attention to the letter, and neglect of the spirit of the scriptures was the cause of their rejection of him. They had fastened their attention on his technical Sabbath-breaking, so that they had none to give to the powerful miracle just performed, and to the proof it furnished of his divine commission. They preferred the honor that came to them on account of the regular and punctilious discharge of ritualistic duties, to the approval of God, which they might have had by abstaining from devouring widows' houses, and living a pure and holy life. How that tendency has survived all these years! To many still, religion consists in regular church attendance which other men can see, and they do not realize that God would be better pleased by a humble, loving, tender heart. Brought down to the last analysis, it is a clear proof that they seek the honor that men give rather than that which God himself gives.

This disposition has its roots in many honored lives. A man will put more money in the collection box in church, if the collector is a man who knows him. People who are strictly honorable in their business relations have been known to "swear off" legitimate taxes, or smuggle valuables through the Custom House. Men in public life, at some parting of the way are swayed more by what other men will say of them than by the thought of God will regard the thing they do. Business men have been known to underpay the women who make the garments they sell, but to give large sums to foreign missions and other Christian or philanthropic work. All this is only an indication that the false sense of honor is still present. The true honor is that which is earned, first and last, with God's approval. He who seeth in secret is the true source of honor. The servant girl who mentioned when examined as to the evidences of her conversion, that now she "swept under the mats," had a clearer view of true honor than many higher stationed Christians. It is very consolatory to think that true honor may be won by such humble persons. The dull drudgery of one who seeks no honor, who does not boast of good deeds, who is content that others shall have credit and glory and reputation, may prove in the day of final account the surest way of attaining the highest honor. In our Lord's description of the judgment, the honors went to men who, so far from seeking or expecting reward, had actually forgotten that they had done the deeds which Christ accounted worthy of everlasting honor.

MY LORD AND I*

I HAVE a friend so precious,
So very dear to me,
He loves me with such tender love,
He loves so faithfully;
I could not live apart from him,
I love to dwell him nigh,
And so we dwell together,
My Lord and I.

Sometimes I'm faint and weary,
He knows that I am weak,
And as he bids me lean on him
His help I gladly seek;
He leads me in the paths of light,
Beneath a sunny sky,
And so we walk together,
My Lord and I.

He knows how much I love him,
He knows I love him well,
But with what love he loveth me
My tongue can never tell;
It is an everlasting love,
In ever rich supply,
And so we love each other,
My Lord and I.

I tell him all my sorrows,
I tell him all my joys,
I tell him all that pleases me,
I tell him what annoys;
He tells me what I ought to do,
He tells me how to try,
And so we talk together,
My Lord and I.

*Mr. S. Hartley, University Place, Neb., sends this beautiful hymn to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with the following note: "I send you the translation of a hymn, which was sung in the caves of France at the time of the persecution of the Huguenots. My understanding is that the hymn was first written in French and afterwards translated into German. Some twenty or more years ago, it was translated into English by Rev. G. W. Abbott, now living at Hastings, Neb. It was recently set to music by Evangelist F. E. Miller, of Morgan Park, Ill.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD, And Many Greenbacks.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and greenbacks to persons who write the most interesting, detailed, and truthful descriptions of their experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum.

2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

3. Did you set such person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black, and with a crisp, rich taste?

4. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full 15 minutes from that time, stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean, placed in the pot, will prevent boiling over.)

5. Give names and account of those you know to have been relieved or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.

6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Decision will be made between October 30th and November 10th, 1901, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers, a box containing a $5 gold piece, to each of the 20 next best writers, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers, for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause.

Cheerful Under Adversity

Miss Lucy M. Richards is known as the "Christian Cripple" of East Poultney, Vermont, the town where Horace Greeley learned the printing business and published his first newspaper. Mr. Greeley was well acquainted with the Richards family. Miss Richards was born in 1837. A fall downstairs when three years old, so injured her spine that she has had very little use of her limbs since. At the age of ten she began using a crutch and a cane. She attended school, being carried to and from the schoolhouse. Later in life, though a cripple, she took the care of both her parents through long and painful sicknesses. Both are now dead. Some years later she broke her right limb by a fall. Miss Richards now depends on a wheel-chair for moving about. With all her drawbacks she is still able to do much. Sitting in her chair she dusts, sweeps, mops, washes, irons, makes bread, tends fires and does other household duties. Besides doing her own work she sews for others, and is usually busy making clothes for customers. This is her means of support. When thirteen years old she was converted. In 1851, she united with the Baptist Church in her native town, and has been a zealous and faithful member. For years, when she attended her church, she has either crawled up, or has been carried up the stairs to the audience-room. Prayer meetings and other gatherings—as Bible studies—are frequently held at her house. She is patient, cheerful and hopeful; sympathetic for those in affliction and kind and generous to all. She is a firm believer in prayer, and has had wonderful proofs of Providential care. God has raised up many kind friends, who are ever ready to help make her life pleasant. Not long since, Mr. Norman Burdick, a native of the town, bought the house where she has lived many years, and has given her the use of it for life. Her life is an inspiration to all who know her. If one in her condition can be bright, cheerful and reconciled to the ways of Providence, surely none have a right to complain.

LUCY M. RICHARDS

THE MAKING OF A PRINCE

The Supplanter Gaining Spiritual Power by Loss of Physical Strength

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

GOD had educated Abraham. He would also educate Jacob. It takes often many long years before we are able, through humbling and bitter experience, to justify God in his description of the human heart—"deceitful above all things and desperately wicked" (Jer. 17: 9). We are all of us born with more or less belief in ourselves, and it takes a lifetime with most of us to learn each for himself, "In me, that is my flesh, dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. 7: 18). By coming to the humbling knowledge of what we are, we come to understand the depth of God's grace that he, the holy One, should look upon such an one. And that the Son of God should have come in the likeness of sinful flesh; in all things made like unto his brethren, and offer himself a sacrifice for those who are unworthy and contemptible—this breaks our hearts, and lays us in speechless adoration at his feet.

Jacob had already shown himself mean, selfish, grasping and untruthful, and yet, with all this, Jacob had a real regard for God; and God had revealed himself to him in the time of his deepest humiliation and discouragement.

But Jacob had not yet learned to trust. He took matters into his own hands, in his dealing with Laban, and family discord was his lot from the very time of his marriage, to which he had so looked forward. How many who have sought their own satisfaction in married life, the companionship, the domestic comfort, etc., which they coveted, have found themselves grievously disappointed. Ill-health, poverty, or unexpected developments of impatience, selfishness, etc., in each other, have levelled to the ground their castles in the air. But those who have entered the married life with the thought of serving God and glorifying his name in Christian family life and service, have no such disappointments. When we take for granted that "All things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8: 28), then every jar in married life brings sweetness and not bitterness. It is seen as a lesson from him who loves us better than life, instead of as a wrong from one who, in the same school as ourselves, is learning his or her lesson too.

It was a life of constant conflict, far other than that which he probably had pictured to himself, alone with his beloved Rachel. At last God interfered, and called him to return to Caanan. After telling Leah and Rachel of the call from above which he had received, and obtaining their concurrence with his intended departure, Jacob's faith in God was still so small that, although God had announced himself as the God of Bethel, where he had promised to be with and to keep him, yet Jacob stole away by night, thinking perhaps that Laban would have detained him. Laban, discovering his departure, pursued him. And what a sting must have been in the conscience of Jacob when he found that the same God who had bid him depart, had forbidden Laban from hindering him! The parting of the relatives after all was in peace, but Jacob had learned how little he trusted God. And now what was before him? Esau. How should he meet his brother? The old habit of self-effort was stronger than the heavenly vision. Without asking God what he should do, he made his own arrangements, and sent messengers before him to Esau his brother. This was better than taking him unawares, as he had stolen away from Laban unawares. But the messengers returned with the alarming tidings: Esau is coming with four hundred men to meet thee.

Acting on his fears, instead of on the promises of God, he divided his family and possessions into two bands, with the thought that if Esau should smite the one, the other, at least would have a chance to escape. And besides this he arranged a large present of cattle, sheep and asses to appease his brother. And, having done this, he prayed. In critical moments of our lives it is the times we spend alone with our God which tell, for time and for eternity. Alone with the burden upon his heart, there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. The man who wrestled with Jacob (was he not the man Christ Jesus?) "when he saw that he prevailed not against him, touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was strained [R. V. v.] as he wrestled with him." Jacob had been a man of self-effort all his life. The great lesson he had to learn as the son of Abraham, "the father of all them that believe," was to "cease from his own works" (Heb. 4: 3) and trust in God's working for him. To this end he must lose his own power; he must learn a lesson which he would carry with him for life.

The stranger said to Jacob, "Let me go, for the day breaketh." And Jacob said what he had been unable to say so long as he depended upon his own efforts, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." Helpless, unable to wrestle, but with the power to cling helplessly to him who had prevailed over him, Jacob was stronger than before he received the injury which taught him his own insufficiency. "What is thy name?" said the stranger. "Jacob," was the answer. "Thy name be called no more Jacob [supplanter], but Israel [prince with God], for thou hast had power with God and with men, and hast prevailed" (Gen. 32: 26-28, R. V.). He is a prince with God who puts God in his place and trusts him. There had never been anything kingly about Jacob until this moment. Now he could count upon his God and insist upon blessing, for he had come over on to God's side. Hitherto he had walked in the twilight. He was ready now to meet with Esau after having met with God. But he halted upon his thigh. When God conquers us he can trust us also to conquer in his strength. Thenceforth God was the God of Jacob, and Jacob was a prince with God.

THE STRENGTH OF THE HILLS
FOR the breezy uplifting of mountains from the sorrows and mists of earth;
For the strength of a loftier purpose, to which thoughts of the hills give birth;
For the fragrant breath of the balsams, with their cool and soothing nod;
"For the strength of the hills, we thank thee,
O, God, our fathers' God!"
When the restful shadows of evening come softly adown the glen,
To smooth the deep-set furrows from the faces and souls of men,
When the purple tints of the valleys creep slowly from the West, Till violet, amber and topaz encircle the mountain's crest,
As they gather in glooms and hollows, with more than the painter's art,
And with faintest touches are soothing the weariness from each heart;
It is then, O, Lord, that we thank thee, for the strength of the hills thou hast trod,
In the days of thine earthly manhood, Son of Mary, and Son of God!
When the pulse-beats are feeble and flighty, and the gasping breath comes quick,
In the strength of the hills we find thee, while the spirit is faint and sick;
For the scent of the breezy woodland, for the pure, sweet breath of the hills,
Which comes laden with strength and vigor,
from myriads of mountain hills;
Distilled from the choicest odors of the resinous fir-tree and pine;
Inhaled in ten thousand dew-drops from the bells of the swaying woodbine.
Thus we're lifted on wings, like eagles, to heights which our Master trod,
In the days of his earthly conflict, our Saviour, the Son of God.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Oct. 9

1. To what extent may a Christian read novels? Where should the line be drawn, assuming, of course, that there are works of fiction that are really profitable?
2. Where was the first public library of the world located and when, and what were the circumstances that led to its establishment?
3. What led John Howard to devote himself to temperance reform?
4. What is the best method of stopping the lynching and burning of human beings in certain parts of the Union, keeping in view the fact that in many cases great provocation exists?
5. Is fear or love the most frequent influence in leading men to become Christians?

Questions of the Week

1. An active Christian worker in Wyoming, writes: "There are two wives of saloon-keepers and a young drug store clerk (who tends a bar in the rear of the drug store), who are being considered as candidates for our C. E. Society. Is it right to accept such people as associate members and to endeavor to surround them with better influences, or should our society decline them as liable to give the work a bad name? What are we working for if not to help sinners, and in what better way can we do this than by bringing them in? I am President of our C. E. Society. Please advise me." We ask our readers to state what course the President should adopt in this case.

[A large number of answers to this question have been received. It is one of so much interest that an entire page will be devoted to the answers in a coming issue.]

2. What is the meaning or interpretation symbolic, historical, allegorical or otherwise, of the pyramid and the eagle on the great seal of the United States?

A number of devices had been suggested to Congress, but none proved entirely acceptable until, in 1779, John Adams was sent to England, to negotiate for peace. While there, he met Sir John Prestwich, a friend of America and an accomplished antiquarian. Adams happened to mention the fact that his countrymen had not yet decided upon a national coat of arms, and Sir John suggested an escutcheon bearing thirteen perpendicular stripes, white and red, like the American flag, with the chief blue, and spangled with thirteen stars. To give this more consequence, he proposed to place it upon the breast of an eagle—the American bird—without supporters, as emblematic of self-reliance. The reverse was to contain a pyramid unfinished, to denote that our strong and stable government might still take on more territory, and underneath, the motto Novus Ordo Seclorum—"A New Series of Ages," denoting that a new order of things had commenced in the Western Hemisphere. This simple device pleased Adams, and was adopted by Congress June 20, 1782.

G. E. KRAUTH.

The eagle is the emblem of power, swiftness, alertness and strength, and by some is thought to be referred to as a national emblem in Isaiah 18, 1-2 and 7th verses as a prophecy. The olive branch held in right claw is emblematic of a people who spread over the earth and dominate the same, being the same emblem given to Joseph, while the bundle of arrows, thirteen in number, represent the thirteen original States, and are emblematic of Jonathan—friendship. The legend held in beak, E Pluribus unum, means one composed of many, and, as well as the arrows and shield on breast, refers to the original number of States. The pyramid represents strength and solidity, and is watched over by the never closing eye of Jehovah. By some it is thought to indicate a belief in our descent from Joseph in Egypt and his people.

3. Should a husband point out her faults to his wife?

A man must never forget to be courteous to his wife. He may tell a wife of her faults in a gentle, pleasant way, if he is sure it is a fault, and not a "beam in his own eye." Oftentimes, in speaking to a wife of her faults, he may call every error a fault, and, in reproving them, get in the way of continually nagging her, and, instead of making matters better, would bring great unhappiness to the wife and to the household as well, for if the wife and mother is unhappy, the family life is not so pleasant. A wife should take correction in the best manner possible, and consider it for her own good. It would be well for both parties to apply the golden rule.

MRS. N. P. OAKERMAN.

I do not think that good would follow from the husband's pointing out to his wife her faults, no more than it would bring good re-speak openly on all subjects, asking and receiving advice on all matters of doubt, relying upon each other for sympathy and help in all of life's trials and difficulties, in fact, living as husband and wife ought to live in the sight of God, there ought to be no hesitancy on the part of either in telling of some action that one has noticed on the part of the other which was not altogether as it should be, and if he be a true man, or she a true woman, they will feel a sense of obligation for having their attention called to this imperfection in their life, which they will at once set about to try and remedy. A true friend is not one who only praises, but who also points out our faults and failings as well. A husband, or wife, should, however, be careful as to how they set about pointing out defects in each other, that it be not done in a spirit of jealousy, harsh or unkind criticism, or a mere desire to pick flaws in each other while in a morbid or unpleasant mood, for we are none of us without imperfections; but if it be done in a spirit of love, and with a desire to help each other to attain that standard of perfection in our lives to which the Master beckons us upward, it will certainly be appreciated. The result depends largely upon the manner in which the disclosure is made, and the motive which prompts it. Indiscriminate fault finding, however, will but tend to cause unpleasantness.

5. What verb is used in the Bible in relation to Divine wrath, the Holy Spirit, love, temptation? Name the passages in which is used.

The verb used is quench. 1. For its relation to Divine wrath, see Isaiah 34: 6, "And the strong shall be as tow, and the maker of it as a spark, and they shall burn together, and none shall quench them." Also II. Kings 22: 17, "Therefore my wrath shall be kindled against this place, and shall not be quenched." See, also, Jeremiah 17: 18, "The fire shall consume him, and shall not be quenched." Jer. 21: 12; Jer. 7: 20; Isa. 66: 24; II. Chronicles 34: 25. 2. For its use in relation to the Holy Spirit, see I. Thes. 5: 19, "Quench not the Spirit." 3. For its use in relation to love, see Song of Solomon 8: 7, "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it," etc. 4. For its use in relation to life, see Isaiah 43: 17, "They are extinguished as tow." Also II. Sam. 22: 5, "And we will destroy the heir also; they shall quench my coal which is left, and shall not leave to my husband neither nor remainder upon the earth." Also I. Sam. 21: 17, "Then the men of David swam him, saying, 'Thou shalt go no more out to us to battle, that thou quench not the fire of Israel.'" 5. For its use in relation to temptation, see Eph. 6: 16, "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

sults for the wife to tell the husband of his shortcomings. Would it not be wiser for him to tell her of her virtues, her good traits, and her loveliness, and to praise every effort she makes to please him, and thus strengthen her to meet the daily tasks of life? The Bible tells the husband to love his wife as he loves himself; to love her as Christ loves the church. Such a love would cover a multitude of faults. I believe that more wives are unhappy to-day because they do not feel that they are precious to their husbands, than from any other one cause. I knew one woman whose whole married life, of thirty-five years, was embittered by one conversation with her husband soon after her marriage, in which he tried to point out to her a fault that he thought ought to be corrected. She could never get over it, and felt hurt and grieved about it as long as she lived. This was foolish, and she was supersensitive, but there is many another wife like her. We cannot account for one another's feelings.

No, do not tell her of her faults, unless they are so serious that they threaten to destroy the happiness of the home life, and then let it be done very carefully and very lovingly.

4. What should be done with the member of the church who by his inconsistencies keeps others out?

Christ gives us a safe rule for such a case (Matt. 18: 15-17), which may be summed up as follows: "If a church member trespass against thee or the church, let an official member go and tell the person their fault privately. If that does not have the desired effect, let the official member take two or more church members with him, and together admonish the person. Should that fail to remedy the conduct of the offending member, let the matter be brought before the council of the church. And if the member still persists in inconsistencies, let him become as a heathen man and a publican."

WM. J. LUSCOMBE.

Keep the inconsistent member in the church. It is the only hope of making him better. Christ reserves to himself the right of separating the wheat from the chaff, in the great harvest day. A man who remains out of the church because of the inconsistencies of others, is not the kind of man who would be any good to a church. If his desire to join the church is the result of a change of heart (the only preparation for church membership), he will "judge not" his fellow members, and will do his duty, no matter what

Miscellaneous Questions

X. Y. Z. Are chaplains in the army or navy appointed from among the graduates of Yale Point and Annapolis, or are they selected from ministers of every-day life?

Major J. B. Ketcham, of the U. S. S. Christian Aid Association, 40 Broadway, New York, gives this answer:

No diploma from the institutions named is necessary. Chaplains are appointed from the clergy of all denominations; but an applicant must not be over forty years of age, and must have served a church at least three years, and be of good and regular standing with his denomination. For form of application and details, address the Secretary of War (or Navy), Washington, D. C.

Puzzled, Brooklyn, N. Y. Do Evolutionists in abandoning the story of Adam and Eve contend that different races had different sets of monkeys as ancestors?

We believe the latest evolutionary theory is that all races descend from a common ancestry but that not the monkey, but some other creature from which the monkey is also descended. Thus the monkey according to the new theory, is not an ancestor but a kind of degenerate cousin to humanity.

RED BUFFALO ADDRESSING THE PONCAS AND DENOUNCING BLACK WOLF

THE PROPHET WHO FAILED

BLACK WOLF
"The Prophet"

FOR many years no Indian tribe of the Southwest has adhered so strictly to the teachings of their medicine men as the Poncas, who live on a small reservation south of the Kansas border. Nothing could be accomplished among the Poncas for this very same reason. No progress was reported in their schools, their manner of dress remained as ever, and they cared nothing for civilization or Christianity. With them work was a stranger, and to starve before earning bread came to be a regular event as the winters came around.

But there is a time among all Indian tribes when the Prophet fails too often in his predictions and the medicine men are at a loss for an effective cure. Such was the state of things among the greatest of prophets; he who had predicted a failure of the Ghost Dance; he who had asked of the Great Spirit and received in bounteous proportions, knew that his powers were failing. It was a sad blow to this dignitary of the plains, and hurt him more deeply than the hard-set expression of his dusky face revealed.

Into his tepee, on the banks of the river, went the Prophet, his squaws standing guard in front. For hours he lacerated his flesh and sent appeals to the Great Spirit. All night he lay in a stupor, the result of having taken of the snake root; but still his powers were unavailing. At daybreak, after a terrible siege of suffering, the Prophet came out to greet his people. A frown spread over their faces: he knew too well it betokened their displeasure. He made a speech, in which he attached all blame to the crow—an evil spirit which at times is supposed to visit the redskins. They listened in silence and when he had finished, the small council of half-breeds who had formed in the centre of the circle, looked to Red Buffalo for reply.

Red Buffalo was dressed in white man's clothes, but his heart was that of the blanketed buck. His hatred has failed; the power of our medicine men is no longer sufficient; let us forsake them. The voice of Black Wolf is two-tongued. He would suffer us to be disgraced by our neighbors that he might hold his power. Let us banish him."

No cheer fell from the lips of the small assembly of Indians. Their approval of the words of Red Buffalo was evident, however, from the fact that everyone glared at Black Wolf sullenly. The Prophet was too familiar with his own people not to know that his influence was hopelessly lost, and that the best thing he could do was to leave. He turned and marched slowly southward to the river banks, slowly humming the death song:

"Father, I come; Father, I come,
I am coming home to die."

After the failure of Black Wolf to conjure up beef for the wants of the red-skinned visitors, the white people in the vicinity of the Ponca reservation, having heard of the banishment of the Prophet, and knowing the good that would come of it, packed up a wagon-load of beef and carried it to the camping-grounds. A few days later the Osages came, and were entertained in a royal manner. They went home praising the hospitality of their neighbors; yet they could not understand, in their simple minds, why the great Ponca Prophet had been banished.

Following the festival, the Indian agent went among the tribe and offered to build houses for them. Red Buffalo accompanied him, and the result was that two-thirds of the five hundred Poncas and adopted Poncas, accepted the offer. Now, instead of a half-thousand tepees dotting the reservation, one sees neat frame houses; the ground is being turned this fall for wheat—the first time since the Poncas lived there—and the women are sending their children to school. The next few years of Ponca history will read like a glowing achievement. Quick to learn, these redskins will no doubt advance rapidly. If we may judge by the experience of other tribes that have come under Christianizing and civilizing influences, the great turning-point of the Poncas has at last been reached.

These young men and women have excellent opportunities before them. The younger people of the tribe, and the next generation assuredly, will reap the benefit of the change. Education, industrial and intellectual, combined with the influences of the Gospel, will lead the redmen into the "better way." Thus, the failure of Black Wolf, the prophet, will ultimately prove to have been a blessing.

Wichita, Kan.

W. R. DRAPER.

THE WHITE PEOPLE DISTRIBUTING MEAT AMONG THE PONCAS

for anything progressive was well known; his wearing of citizen's clothes was compulsory because of his position as an Indian policeman. Red Buffalo spoke in low, sad tones:

"My brothers," he said, "a change is about to take place among us. I have for years looked to Black Wolf as a power of the Great Spirit clan, but he can do nothing any more. I do not believe the crow is with us; Black Wolf has lost his power. The pale-face is too thick about us. I would fight, but it means death. Life is sweet! I have been offered assistance by the pale-faces many times, but have refused. We have lain in our tepees during the cold winters and suffered. But let us do so no more. The light of the Great Spirit the Poncas this summer, and, as a result, they are a scared people. The Government is placing them on allotments, the big braves are intent to live in houses and medicine men are tilling the soil. A Prophet has been banished, and the future of the Poncas seem bright to those who are interested in the advancement. It is credited that in a few more years the blanketed Ponca will be a curiosity. Even now he is so far in the majority that a Ponca in civilized clothing attracts attention on their own reservation.

The change came about in this way. Black Wolf, the Prophet, the highest of all in Ponca circles, had called a meeting of the tribe on the bank of the Arkansas River, adjoining the Osage reserve. The sages were to be the guests of the Poncas, and, of course, a good supply of eatables were necessary. Black Wolf called on the medicine men to bring forth the meat. They failed, that is, the help of the Great Spirit failed to answer their supplications, and the medicine men were disgraced. The Prophet was scorned by his people for having such a poor retinue of assistants. The whole tribe laughed at the inability of their former spiritual advisers. They awoke to a realization that unless meat was secured, the Ponca people would suffer great disgrace, as no tribe should fail to provide for its visitors.

The Black Wolf became interested in his own failure. He found that his power was diminishing, but would not admit his loss. He who had been for years

Borrowing Trouble

TEXT—Matt. 6: 34

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof

THE life of every man, woman and child, is as closely under the divine care, as though such person were the only man, woman or child. There are no accidents. As there is a law of storms in the natural world, so there is a law of trouble, a law of disaster, a law of misfortune; but the majority of the troubles of life are imaginary, and the most of those anticipated never come. At any rate, there is no cause of complaint against God. See how much he has done to make you happy: his sunshine filling the earth with glory, making rainbow for the storm and halo for the mountain, greenness for the moss, saffron for the cloud, and crystal for the billow, and procession of bannered flame through the opening gates of the morning, chaffinches to sing, rivers to glitter, seas to chant, and springs to blossom, and overpowering all other sounds with its song, and overarching all other splendor with its triumph, covering up all other beauty with its garlands, and outflashing all other thrones with its dominion—deliverance for a lost world through the Great Redeemer.

I discourse of the sin of borrowing trouble.

First: Such a habit of mind and heart is wrong, because it puts one into a despondency that ill fits him for duty. I planted two rose-bushes in my garden; the one thrived beautifully, the other perished. I found the dead one on the shady side of the house. Our dispositions, like our plants, need sunshine. Expectancy of repulse is the cause of many secular and religious failures. Fear of bankruptcy has upturned many a fine business, and sent the man dodging among the note-shavers. Fear of slander and abuse has often invited all the long-beaked vultures of scorn and backbiting. Many of the misfortunes of life, like hyenas, flee if you courageously meet them.

Toiling in the Sunlight

How poorly prepared for religious duty is a man who sits down under the gloom of expected misfortune! If he prays, he says, "I do not think I shall be answered." If he gives, he says, "I expect they will steal the money." Helen Chalmers told me that her father, Thomas Chalmers, in the darkest hour of the history of the Free Church of Scotland, and when the woes of the land seemed to weigh upon his heart, said to his children, "Come, let us go out and play ball or fly kite," and the only difficulty in the play was that the children could not keep up with their father. The McChyneys and the Summerfields of the church who did the most good toiled in the sunlight. Away with the horrors! they distil poison; they dig graves; and if they could climb so high, they would drown the rejoicings of heaven with sobs and wailing.

You will have nothing but misfortune in the future if you sedulously watch for it. How shall a man catch the right kind of fish if he arranges his line, and hook, and bait to catch lizards and water-serpents? Hunt for bats and hawks, and bats and hawks you will find. Hunt for robin-rebreasts, and you will find robin-rebreasts. One night an eagle and an owl got into fierce battle; the eagle, unused to the night, was no match for the owl, which is most at home in the darkness, and the king of the air fell helpless; but the morning rose, and with it rose the eagle; and the owls, and the night-hawks, and the bats came a second time to the combat; now the eagle, in the sunlight, with a stroke of his talons and a great cry, cleared the air, and his enemies, with torn feathers and splashed with blood, tumbled into the thickets. Ye are the children of light. In the night of despondency you will have no chance against your enemies that flock up from beneath, but, trusting in God and standing in the sunshine of the promises, you shall "renew your youth like the eagle."

Again: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong, because it has a tendency to make us overlook present blessing. To slake man's thirst, the rock is cleft, and cool waters leap into his brimming cup. To feed his hunger, the fields bow down with bending wheat, and the cattle come down from the clover pastures to give him milk, and the orchards yellow and ripen, casting their juicy fruits into his lap. Alas! that amid such exuberance of blessing, man should growl as though he were a soldier on half rations, or a sailor on short allowance; that a man should stand neck-deep in harvests looking forward to famine; that one should feel the strong pulses of health marching with regular tread through all the avenues of life, and yet tremble at the expected assault of sickness; that a man should sit in his pleasant home, fearful that ruthless want will some day rattle the broken window-sash with tempest, and sweep the coals from the hearth, and pour hunger into the breadtray; that a man fed by him who owns all the harvests should expect to starve; that one whom God loves and surrounds with benediction, and attends with angelic escort, and hovers over with more than motherly fondness, should be looking for

A Heritage of Tears!

Has God been hard with thee, that thou shouldst be foreboding? Has he stinted thy board? Has he covered thee with rags? Has he spread traps for thy feet, and galled thy cup, and rasped thy soul, and wrecked thee with storm, and thundered upon thee with a life full of calamity? If your father or brother come into your bank where gold and silver are lying about, you do not watch them, for you know they are honest; but if an entire stranger come by the safe, you keep your eye on him, for you do not know his designs. So some men treat God; not as a father, but a stranger, and act suspiciously toward him. It is high time you began to thank God for present blessings. Thank him for your children, happy, buoyant, and bounding. Praise him for your home, with its fountain of song and laughter. Adore him for morning light and evening shadow. Praise him for fresh, cool water, bubbling from the rock, leaping in the cascade, soaring in the mist, falling in the shower, dashing against the rock, and clapping its hands in the tempest. Love him for the grass that cushions the earth, and the clouds that curtain the sky, and the foliage that waves in the forest. Thank him for a Bible to read, and a Saviour to deliver.

Many Christians think it a bad sign to be jubilant, and their work of self-examination is a hewing down of their brighter experiences. Like a boy with a new jack-knife, hacking everything he comes across, so their self-examination is a religious cutting to pieces of the greenest things they can lay their hands on. They imagine they are doing God's service when they are going about borrowing trouble, and borrowing it at thirty per cent, which is always a sure precursor of bankruptcy.

Again: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong, because the present is sufficiently taxed with trial. God sees that we all need a certain amount of trouble, and so he apportions it for all the days and years of our life. Alas for the policy of gathering it all up for one day or year! Cruel thing to put upon the back of one camel all the cargo intended for the entire caravan. I never look at my memorandum book to see what engagements and duties are far ahead. Let every week bear its own burdens. The shadows of to-day are thick enough, why implore the presence of other shadows? The cup is already distasteful, why hallow to disasters far distant to come, and wring out more gall in the bitterness? Are we such champions that, having won the belt in former encounters, we can go forth to challenge all the future!

Do Not Worry

Here are business men just able to manage affairs as they now are. They can pay their rent, and meet their notes, and manage affairs as they now are, but how if a panic should come, and my investments should fail? Go to-morrow and write on your day-book, or on your ledger, on your money-safe, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Do not worry about notes that are far from due. Do not pile up on your counting-desk the financial anxieties of the next twenty years. The God who has taken care of your worldly occupation, guarding your store from the torch of the incendiary and the key of the burglar, will be as faithful in 1910 as in 1901; God's hand is mightier than the machinations of stock-gamblers, or the plots of political demagogues, or the red right arm of revolution, and the darkness will fly and the storm fall dead at his feet.

So there are persons in feeble health, and they are worried about the future. They make out very well now, but they are bothering themselves about future pleurisies, and rheumatisms, and neuralgias, and fevers. Their eyesight is feeble, and they are worried lest they entirely lose it. Their hearing is indistinct, and they are alarmed lest they become entirely deaf. They felt chilly to-day, and are expecting an attack of typhoid. They have been troubled for weeks with some perplexing malady, and dread becoming life-long invalids. Take care of your health now, and trust God for the future. Be not guilty of the blasphemy of asking him to take care of you while you sleep with your windows tight down, or eat chicken-salad at eleven o'clock at night, or sit down on a cake of ice to cool off. Be prudent, and then be confident. Some of the sickest people have been the most useful. It was so with Payson, who died deaths daily, and Robert Hall, who used to stop in the midst of his sermon, and lie down on the pulpit rest, and then go on again. Theodore Frelinghuysen had a great horror of dying till the time came, and went peacefully. Take care of the present, and the future look out for itself. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Again: The habit of borrowing misfortune is wrong because it unfits us for it when it actually does come. We cannot always have smooth sailing. Life will sometimes tumble among declivities, and be steep, and be thorn-pierced. Judas will kiss you, and then sell us for thirty pieces of silver. Scorn will try to crucify us between two thieves. We will hear the iron gate of the sepulchre creak as it shuts on our kindred. But we cannot get rid of these things by forebodings. They who fight against the iron gates of the future. Their ammunition will have been wasted long before they come upon the guns of real misfortune. Boys, in attempting to jump a wall, sometimes go so far back in order to get a running start that when they come up they are exhausted; and long races in order to get spring enough to vault over a wall, bring us up at last to the dreadful reality of weakness gone.

The Peace of Faith

Finally: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong because it is unbelief. God has promised to take care of us. The Bible blooms with assurances. Your hunger will be fed; your sickness will be alleviated; your sorrows will be healed. God will sandal your feet, and smooth your path, and along by frowning cliffs, and opening grave sound the voices of victory and cheer. The summer clouds that seem thunder-clouds really carry in their bosom harvests of wheat and shocks of corn, and vineyards purpling for the vintage. The wrathful wave will kiss the feet of the storm-walker. Our great Joshua will command the sun and moon to stand still, and the stars to halt. Bleak and wave-struck Patmos shall have apocalyptic vision, and you shall hear the cry of elders, a sweep of wings, and trumpets of salvation, and the voice of Hallelujah unto God for ever.

Your way may wind along dangerous bridle paths, and amid wolf's howl, and the scream of the vulture, but the way still winds upward till angels guard it, and trees of life overarch it, and thrones line it, and crystalline fountains leap on it, and the pathways end at gates that are pearl, and streets that are gold, and temples that are always open, and hills that quail with perpetual song, and a city mingling for ever with jubilee, and triumph, and coronation.

Let Pleasure chant her siren song,
'Tis not the song for me:
To weeping it will turn ere long,
For this is Heaven's decree.

But there's a song the ransomed sing,
To Jesus their exalted King,
With joyful heart and tongue,
Oh, that's the song for me!

Courage; my brother! The father does not get his son at school enough money to last him several years; but, as the bills for tuition, and board, and clothing, and books come in, pays them. So God will give you grace all at once for the future; but will need all your exigencies as they come. Through earnest prayer, trust him. People ascribe the success of a certain line of steamers to business skill, and know the fact that when that line of steamers started the wife of the proprietor passed the whole of each day, when a steamer sailed, in prayer to God for its safety, and the success of the line. Put everything in God's hands, and leave it there. Large interest money will soon eat up a farm, a store, an estate; and the interest on borrowed troubles will swamp any profit. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."
